The Achaïans having obtained too much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their Forces by Sea and Land; made open War upon Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatus, for the liberty of Athen. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrel had lost a Battail, the Athenians wore Garlands, in sign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the Victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in general of the Multitude, Aut humiliter ferunt, aut superbi dominantur; Is either bawls in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheless when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by Money, which he could not by force: and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaïans, loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could do; but into their Corporation they entered not, forming it belike, in regard of their own outworn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased with in Peloponnesus, by justice and honesty, so did the Ætoliens, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus itself, wax very powerful, by sturdy of Body, and due courage in fight, without help of any other virtue. They had stoutly defended themselves against Antipater and Cleonymus; partly by daring to do and suffer much, partly by the Natural strength and faithness of their Country; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captains to other business, as hath been related. They had molested Cassander, in favour of Antigonus, and were themselves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the Son of the first Antigonus, and more or less with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often War with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirus, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: So that they were hardened with a perpetual Travail, seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardiness ill deserved the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honesty or friendship, measuring all things by their own insolent wills, and thinking all People base-minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Ætoliens had lately made great spoils in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the Countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achaïans; taken and sacked Pallene; where, although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gain made them make a new Voyage thither, as to a Countrey wherein somewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatus: Who pressed them so hardly, that they were driven to seek help of the Achaïans; which they obtained. The War which the Achaïans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Asia, thought it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætoliens, at whose instance it was set on foot: For thereby were the Macedonian Forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged, though very basely the Ætoliens, giving thanks in words, devised how to require the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaïans were desirous to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: Of which intent the Lacedemonians were very jealous. Wherefore these Ætoliens laboured carefully to set the Lacedemonians and Achaïans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to pass, themselves should be called in to help (it skilled not on whar side) and so get no small share, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that this Kingdom hath sustained by the Achaïans. Offhis plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedemonians cause to take Arms. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Acadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: And thereby had provoked the Lacedemonians to look about them; seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Ætoliens, and a few Acadians their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaïan.

The City of Sparta was in ill case about these times, and subject to the injury of any stronger neighbour. Pyræus had greatly weakened it, The Ætoliens entering Liconia with an Army, had carried away Fifty Thousand Slaves, and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppressed by the rich, and the generosity of Spirit, that that had sometime been their general virtue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There was left in Sparta no more than Seven Hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one Hundred had Lands: All the rest were needy People, and delirious of innovation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition, which endangered the City most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reform the disorders of the State, exhorted the People to a strict Observation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpose he caused them to pass an Act, for the abolishing all debts, and equal division of Lands. All the younger, and poorer sort were glad of this: But the rich men opposed it. There had recourse unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himself a dissolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his Wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsellors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their own private commodity. They were hasty to take away all debts, and cancel all Bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted: But the division of Lands they afterwards hindered, because their own possessions were great. Hence arose a Tumult in Sparta, which their men increased by their foul oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdom, and the Two adverse Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which Cleomenes, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: But Agis was raised forth, drawn into Prison, and there by his Enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-Mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: And (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should have given Patronage to the Laws, using their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City as the Law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and served to establish the impotent rule of a few Tyrannical Oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adjoin Lacedemon to the Achaïans Common-wealth: though it were great injustice to take such advantage, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta itself, if it could have been wrought by persuasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did also require the unjust attempts of the Achaïans, even in their own kind: Obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponnesus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should have been the principal, not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus caused Agis to be slain, took his Wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in Marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his Wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discouraged much with her about the purpose of her former Husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himself to be King, whilst he was very young, he gladly embraced all occasions of War: For that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally in so corrupt an estate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and forsake Athenaena, a Temple on the marches of Liconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended Title, he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprise Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then Confederate with the Lacedemonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painful Night travel, and discovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorry. By these degrees the War began. In the entrance whereof Aratus had discovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have stayed the quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lysidas and Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so urgent. Aristomachus was at that time General of the Achaïans, (he and Lysidas being of great account, since they had abandoned their Tyranny) who sent unto Aratus, lying then in Achaia, and required his assistance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serve, therefore he came in person, and took part of a business, little pleasing him in the present, and less in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himself again Aristomachus, who desired to give Battel. Yet had the Achaïans Twenty Thousand Foot, and One Thousand Horse, in their Army: Whereas Cleomenes had no more than Five Thousand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedemonian, and raised an ill report upon Aratus; which Lysidas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Nevertheless the Achaïans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the year following; against Lysidas his accuser that fued for the place. Being General himself, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the landrous words of Lysidas. Therefore he putpoted to set upon the Ætoliens: But was met withal on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great Battel, and drove him to hide himself all Night for fear, so that he was thought to have been slain. This misadventure Aratus recompensed by a risk of his own more natural occupation: Performing with his bric ken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been Victorious. For whilst there was no suspicion of any great matter that he could undertake, he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him in to their City. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before joined themselves with the Achaïans; but shortly upon fear, or some other passion, they gave themselves to the Ætoliens; and from the Ætoliens, presently after this Victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they werethis won. For this their levity they were not punished, but freely admitted now again into the Achaïan Society. As this good success repaired the credit of Aratus, so another Battel almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered near unto Megalopolis, where the Achaïans had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lysidas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger, and taking with him all the Horse, brake upon the Lacedemonians whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slain by them, and his followers driven back upon their own Companions: in such sort, that finally all the Army was disordered and put to flight. This was a great loss, and incensed the Achaïans against Aratus: Yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the War nevertheless, wherein though Cleomenes was some Towns, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done, the Achaean being weary, and the Spartan King incentive to another business.

Cleomenes having led into the Field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painful journeys, forsook the Achaean War on a sudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he slew the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient Discipline of Lycurgus. Then he gave an account of his doings; and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the power of Kings, and many disorders had grown in the City, he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal division of the Land, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by chusing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: So that henceforth his Country might not altogether stand in need of Mercenary help, as it lately had done, to save it self from the Aetolians, Illyrians, and such other Enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied, and Cleomenes himself ready in the Field, ere his Enemies could take any advantage of these his domestic troubles.

The Achaean hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the City, for fear of some Rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had waited all the Country of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantineia; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. These new displeased them not a little: But they must patiently endure to hear worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his Authority, he proceeded more roundly in his war, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedaemonians refused their ancient courage; and he himself had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth content about the possession of a few Towns: but adventured to win or lose all. The Aetolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themselves on his side: And whereas he had gotten Mantineia, Tegaea, and other places; to which they had some Title, they willingly renounced all their interest unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Country, and saw that Antigonus, with the Aetolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he advised how to provide against the worst, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to save all from utter ruin. The office of General, when it was next put upon him, he refused; fearing to be so far preft, as to hazard in one Battle all the force of his Country, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of Warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surprise, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, overcharged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the Weal-publick, though in aiming at the general good, it seems that private passion drew him into an ill course. He saw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of Bat-tel; that Mantineia had not only opened her Gates unto Cleomenes, but slain the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulsion; and that Arifonachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since General of the Achaean, was now revolted unto the Enemy following the fortune of Cleomenes. Protry was too far off to help; and the nearness of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be useful, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his own profit. To make trial hereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpose, and instructed them how to deal with Antigonus, and the Achaean.

The City of Megalopolis had been well affected to the Macedonians, ever since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by some special benefits. At this time it lay nearest unto the danger; was very faithful, and therefore deserved succour: yet could not well be relieved by the Achaean, with their own proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should be sent unto the General Council of Achaia, requesting leave and good allowance to try the favour of Antigonus in their necessity. This was granted for lack of what else to answer: and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly telling him of the good will and respect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predecessors; of their present need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them intrusion; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aetolians, might redound to his own great loss or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; and how Aratus himself did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaean under the Patronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their discourse. He embraced the motion: And to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help should not be wanting, so far forth as might stand with the Achaean good-liking. Particularly he commended himself by these Messengers to Aratus, assuring them, that he thought himself highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived not to have been grounded upon any hatred to love to his own Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: And are presently sent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Achaean were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his consent; and praised the wisdom of the Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest means of their common safety: adding nevertheless, that it were not amiss, first of all to try their own ability; which if failed, then should they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himself moderate; in that which himself of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustain the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amiss; since it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurely, the general consent.

Never

Nevertheless, in true estimation, this fineness of Aratus might have been used, with his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the War, by yielding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: Since thereby he should both have freed his Country from all further trouble, and withal, should have restored unto the universal state of Greece, this honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had benefit. But it is commonly found (which is great pity) that Vertues, having risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it (as it were) in the seat of principality, by length of time, and success of many actions, can ill endure the hasty growth of any others reputation, where-with it feels it self likely to be overtopped. Other cause to despise the Lacedaemonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous case: Neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had stood in doubt of the one, when he thought himself more mighty than the other. (Wherefore he was justly plagued, when he saw his own honour reversed by the insolent Macedonians; and instead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was defended of a long race of Kings, the posterity of Heracles, was fain to do sacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a God, and was finally posyressed by Philip, whose Nobility was but of five generations, and whom perhaps he might have seen his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. But by this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Protry was lost: Who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberality, as he had used to the Achaean; being warned, as may seem, by their example, to be more wary both in trusting and disturbing. Cleomenes himself, whilst this business with Antigonus was a foot, passed through Acadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achaean to Battle. At the City of Dynæs in Achaia were assembled all the remaining Forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make trial; whether perhaps they might amend their state, without seeking help of the Macedonians. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had to great a Victory, that the Enemy was no longer able to keep the open Field. The calamity was such, that Aratus himself durst not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaean were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted upon this estate condition: That they should not arrogate unto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedaemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leader in War. Hereunto if they would consent, he promised unto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his Prisoners ransom free: Also that they should enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaean: Who desired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the War.

Now seeming the affairs of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had ever been since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Wars, yea, or since the Persian invasion: When God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindered all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extrem sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheless he sent home the chief of his Prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achaean in their desire of his friendship; who assembled again at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it, and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of resolving. When all would not serve turn, he betook himself to his cunning; and sent word to Cleomenes, that he should do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hostages for safety of his person: Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this advertisement; and took it in ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had been an estate matter, to have told him so much at the first, and not have made him come so far with an Army, which afterwards he must dismiss. Yet that chiefly seems to have troubled him, was the drift of his opponents, who fought thereby, either to make him wear without the gates, and deal only with themselves and their Messengers, or if he would adventure himself into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal flesh, that might breed respect of him in the mind of the people. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his coming: Lured in person; lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, should presently be won with his gentle words, and vanish the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes came unto the whole Council, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: And Aratus was not far behind with him in a bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were to fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their present weakness, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terror, he won Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this case Aratus sent his own Son to Cleomenes, intreating him to defer no time, but come presently to relieve the distressed Achaean. Antigonus gave good words as could be wished: Saving that he utterly refused to do any thing, unless he might first have Aceronchus put into his hands. This demand was somewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promised to help the Horse against his Enemy the Stag: But with condition, that the Horse should suffer him to be faddled and bridled. Aratus was here-withal contented, but wanting all honest colour to do it: Seeing the Corinthians had no way deferred to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found, for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himself out of their City, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Cause should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ran to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made halt with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to have it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leave. Whilst this was doing, he took special order, that Aratus his House and Goods, within the Town, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, Peloponnesians; promising, that if he would hearken to their persuasion, then would he give him double the same

penion, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolemy. As for the Cattle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured sovereignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be jointly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Acheans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus, rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own Son as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Acheans, to put Acroecrinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seized upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Country of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Isthmus, having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the Straights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this journey. At his coming thither, he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: And that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard Battle, but rather to weary him thence with hunger; against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able to do so: He secretely got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity, news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his enemies. The Acheans were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the King of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbore to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of friends, and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his Victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all Debtors to be discharged from their Creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta was agreeable to the Spartan institution: In other places, where it would have been Tyrannical, he did not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Acheans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces therefore that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the Enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continual messengers, that his men which held the Citadel of Argos were almost lost: He began to fear least his labour in guarding the entry should grow frivolous; the Acheans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook the custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: Which if he could save, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos, that both Argives and Acheans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets; when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afar off, halting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, then to make a free retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: Loking in short space all, or mozt of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Acridia; where he won such Castles as were held for Cleomenes; and restored them to the old Possessors. This doing, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Acheans, to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Acheans were not behind with him; but made him Captain-General over them and their Confederates: And further entered into Covenant with him, that they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writings, or Embassadours, without his consent. All this while and somewhat longer Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: Carrying him to Sicyon his own Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only styled him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as Sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: Which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if instead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this god was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Acheans. This was hardly taken: Yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himself over-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the statues which he had erected, of those that had taken Acroecrinthus with him, were all thrown down by the same King, and one only left unto himself at his earnest intreaty. It might therefore appear, that this god was also spurious. Nevertheless in taking revenge upon those that offended him, Aratus did satiate his own passion by the aid of these Macedonians. For with extreme Torments he did put Aristomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos, afterwards General of the Acheans, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans, for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Acheans. For he slew all the principal Citizens, and dead the rest; Men, Women and Children, all for bond-slaves: Dividing the spoil; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Acheans. The Town it self was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this business, caused it be new named Antigonis. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse, than even the flattery which Aratus was driven to use to Antigonus: Forasmuch as it was taken of fertility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to speak of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonians brought in the Civil State of the Acheans, let us return unto this War against the Lacedæmonians.

The next Summer Antigonus won Tegæa, Mantineæ, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telpusæ: Mantineæ

tinææ he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Acheans, with whom he wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineæ, and to those other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Egyptian promised much, but would perform nothing, unless he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his Children in pledge. These were sent unto Egypt, yet the aid came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the business of Greece, rather for his minds sake, than upon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himself, as well as his own ability would serve. He manumitted all the Helotes which were the Lacedæmonian Slaves: Taking money for their liberty, and arming two Thousand of them after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his Forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis, that lay secure, as having defended it self in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The Town he wan: But after he was entered, all that were fit to bear Arms rose hastily against him; and though they could not drive him out, yet saved the multitude, to whom they gave a Porter free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and Goods to them again; if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: Wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great booty that he found therein. These news astonished the Acheans at Ægium: Who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering-places: But they were so long in coming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himself to Argos, there to pass the rest of his unlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Acheans. When he had lain a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the Field, were very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiser than to be moved with their clamours, and suffered them to see their Villages burnt; to bid him resign his Office of Protector unto some that were more valiant; and to satiate their passions with foolish words, rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakening the reputation of his Enemy: Though he hereby added neither followers, nor other strength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for War, Antigonus gathered together all his Troops; meaning to requite these bravadoes of his Enemy, with the Conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other side laboured to keep the War from his own gates; and therefore eyed upon the Country of Argos, where he made such a havoc, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonians was fain to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Philiastians, and Orchomenians, drove a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending him in scorn, to borrow the keys. These were light things; yet served to dishearten the Acheans side, and to fill the Enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting up his self, without any more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty Thousand Foot, and twelve Hundred Horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Ilyrians, Gauls, Epirians, Boeotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans; and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all forty two Thousand, which he lay at Scissia: Fortifying lightly by the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus coming unto Salsia, found his Enemy so strongly encamped, upon and between the Hills of Evea and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: Neither lay it in his power to come battly to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assailing their well defended Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Ilyrians, to force that part which lay on the Hill Evea. But his Ilyrians were so ill seconded by the Achean Foot, that the Spartan Horse, and light-armed Foot, incamped in the straight valley between those Hills, slipped forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the Battle, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Euclydas, his Brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: Who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopemen the Aradian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on Horse, as a private young man, among the Acheans. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Ilyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them perfwaded the Captains of the Achean Horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: Partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their places, until they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopemen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, increased some of his own Country-men to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Ilyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Ilyrians had attempted, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perfwaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: The folly of Euclydas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in Plain, where they might fight upon even terms. So he recovered the Hill-top; where, though he was fore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, until the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: Who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonos himself, was like to have been surrounded and loit, if he had not withdrawn himself with an extraordinary speed. In this Battle ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta, where he had no desire to stay; finding only two Hundred left, of six Thousand Spartans that he had led unto this Battle, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he persuaded his people to yield themselves unto Antigonos; and promising to do all that should at any time lie in his own power, for their good, he halted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and embarked himself for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Evergetes; who undertook to restore him to his Kingdom, and (perhaps) meant no less, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the meantime, he had a Pension allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his Son Ptolemy Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and base Men, unmindful of all virtue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to return into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus did seem to invite him; Ptolemy and his Minions, would neither give him aid, nor yet dared to dismiss him (as he desired) to try his own friends in Greece, lest he were too well acquainted with the weakness of Egypt; nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they devised matter against him, and made him Prisoner: the last act of him was, that with thirty of his Country-men, he undertook a desperate enterprize: Breaking out of the Prison, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebel and seek their liberty. In which attempt he slew some Enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalf) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolemy was bold to throw his indignation: And slew his Mother and Children, that had been sent thither, as Hostages, together with the Wives of his Adherents, as many as were there attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leontidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloody end, as now befell his own Wife, Son, and Grand children.

After the Victory at Sellasia: Antigonos without resistance entered Sparta: Whereinto never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Laws and Government: Tarrying there no longer than two or three days: After which he halstened out of Peloponnesus, and never returned. The cause of this speedy departure was an advertisement that he received out of Macedon: how the Illyrians over-ran and destroyed the Country. Had these news come a little sooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few days longer, or at least-wife tarried a few days after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdom of Lacedæmon would have stood, and perhaps have extended it self over all Greece. But God had otherwise decreed.

Antigonos fought a great Battle with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his-bane: Not by any wound, but by over-straining his voice; wherewith he brake a vein that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a Consumption of the Lungs. His Kingdom descended unto Philip the Son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: As about the same time it was, that Antiochus, furnished (I know not why) the Greeks; and Ptolemy Philopater, began to Reign in Asia and Egypt: Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemy, though old enough to lose Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy all the seventeen years of his Re-ign. The unripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconvenience to their Kingdoms, as is usual in the minority of Princes: But their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more feasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdoms, more at large.

SECT. VII.

How the Illyrians infested the Coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

WHILE things thus passed in Greece, and whilst the Carthaginians were buile in their Conquest of Spain, the Romans had found themselves work among the Sardinians and Corficans, that were first subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also War with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little gain. With the Gauls in Italy, they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Livy saith, a Tumult than a War. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath been shewed before: Of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meet to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia, a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making War for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, King of Macedon, to help the Mydonians his friends, that were bellegied by the Aetolians, for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydonians were so far spent, that the Aetolians commended about the booty: The old Prætor, or chief Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the Victory, and the division of the spoil to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the Town: Others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old Orders might be kept. It was a petty strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the Victories, which anon they loit, as Patiers and Agincourts. The Aetolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, that the old and the new Prætor should be joyn-

ly intuled in the victory, and have equal authority in distributing of the gettings. But the Illyrians fulfilled the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Aetolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydonians, that were no idle in their own business, but stoutly sallied out of the Town. Many of the Aetolians were slain, more were taken, their Camp and all their Baggage was loit: The Illyrians took the spoil, and went their way; the Mydonians erected a Trophie inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrates (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Aetolians had directed them by example.

The success of this Voyage highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians. Not only in regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance, or of the booty that was gotten, but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasy to enrich himself by setting upon the less Warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and drank to immoderately, that he fell into a Plurisie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left unto Teta his Wife.

Teta gave her people free liberty to Rob all forts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if he had been sole Mistress of the salt Waters. She sent a Fleet and sent it into Greece; willing her Captains to make War where they found advantage, without any further respect. The first fell on the Western Coast of Peloponnesus, where they invaded the Eleans, and Megarians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the City of Phenice, to take in victuals and other necessaries. There lay in Phenice eight Hundred Gauls, that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Argentineum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds diffamed and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet encattered by their Epirians, to whom they Garrison within their Epirus. The Gauls were soon grown acquainted with the Illyrians: to whom they betrayed Phenice, which deserved none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in Arms, and halstened to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirians lay before the Town, there came news into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by the Land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queen Teta had sent to help his fellows. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good the Town, and the straight adjoyning, by which their new comers must enter into their Country; another part of them remains at Phenice, to continue the Siege. Neither the one nor the other speed well in their business. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyn with his fellows; and they that were bellegied within Phenice, sallied out of the Town, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirians, as made them despair of saving their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Abasians and Aetolians: Craving their help, with very pious terms of intreaty. They obtained their suit: neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus to present Batel unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Teta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Myrians against her: So that he had no mind to put his Forces to hazard, but offered compulsion, which was accepted. The agreement was, that the Epirians might ransom their Town, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and Slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own Country by Land; sending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this Voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilst they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Teta, that she should abstain from doing such injuries. These Embassadors found her very jolly; both for the riches which her Fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in a short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, save only the Town of Phenice, which her Forces held straightly bellegied. Swilling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings, and, calling them by another name, Prætor, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, that injury in publick the would do them none: As for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadors) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publick, of those private wrongs that are born out by publick Authority: I therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. These words the Queen took so impatiently, that no revenge could satisfy her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slain: As if that had been the way to her heart at rest; which was indeed the mean to disquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two Hundred Gallies, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselves any more with requiring satisfaction: For this injury is of such nature, as must be requiried with mortal War. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to use violence towards Embassadors: The reason and ground whereof, seems to be this; that since without mediation, there would never be an end of War and Destruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should pass freely, and in safety, between Enemies. Nevertheless, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For any King or State lay hold upon Embassadors sent by their Enemies, not unto themselves, but unto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrel; then it is lawful to use violence to those Embassadors; thus employed to make the War more terrible (thus employed to kill the men of War, and Subjects of an Enemy. And so might the Athenians have answered when they flew the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a War upon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadors, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whole Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true office of an Embassador residing, is the maintenance of amity, if it be not lawful for one Prince to practice against the life of another; much less may an Embassador do it without incurring justly the fame danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place gives him no privilege at all. But we will leave this dispute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassador Carneuius.

The Illyrian Queen was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to tilt against her. She was indeed in an error, that hath undone many of all sorts, greater and less than she, both before and since: Having more regard unto Fame, than unto the substance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Æpirots had the name of the most Warlike People in Greece; these had the easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater than of Ten Thousand men, and that nevertheless, it prevailed as much by odds of number, as by valour, or skill in Arms; she would have continued to use her advantage against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not have needed to oppose her late gotten reputation against those that were more mighty than her self. But she was a Woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater Fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This Fleet divided it self, and one part of it fell with (a) Dyrachium, the other with Corycya. Dyrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In (b) Corycya the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Acheans were called in to help; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: Lofing besides others of less note, Marcus Caryneus, the First Victor of Achaia, whom Atrides succeeded. The Town of Corycya, dismayed with this overthrow, opened the Gates unto Demetrius Pharus, who took possession of it with an Illyrian Garrison: Sending the rest of his Forces to Besiege Dyrachium. In the mean season, Tenarus was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to try any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when Adriaticus was brought C. Falsinus the Consul, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely was that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consul failed thither; where he found the Town of Corycya so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consul failed along the Coast to (c) Apollonia, accompanied with Demetrius, whom he used henceforth as his Counsellor and Guide. To Apollonia came also Fajlownus, the other Consul, with the Land Army, numbered at Twenty Thousand Foot, and Two Thousand Horse. Thence they hastened towards Dyrachium, which the Illyrians had Besieged; but upon news of the Roman Army they dispersed themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria; and take Parthenia, beat the Illyrians by Sea, take Twenty of their Ships, and enforce the Queen Tenara to forsake the Coast, and to cover her self in Rijon far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part stays behind, and prosecutes the War, in such sort, that Tenara was forced to beg Peace; which he obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria; and pay Tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her Ships of War towards the Coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Disia: except it were some one of two Vessels unarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian War, the Romans sent Embassadors into diverse parts of Greece, signifying their love to their Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made War with good success upon Tenara, and her People. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their Patronage: Which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadors were only rewarded with thanks, and a Decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be parakers of the Illyrian patimes. This was an idle courtesy, but well meant by the vain Greeks; and therefore well taken by the Romans: Who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

SECT VIII.

Of the War between the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

The Gauls that dwell in Lombardy were the next, against whom the Romans took Arms. There was a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own Forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they took Rome and burnt it: Though the issue of that War proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times their success was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrows they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well advised: lightly stirred up to War, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than Men; but when that was past, less than Woman. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: Yet gave always careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertain, by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were were called Wars, but Tumulus Gallicus, Tumults of the Gauls: And rightly. For they gave many alarms to Italy, and used to rise with great Armies; but after a few days March, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest Ten or Twelve Years, sometimes Twenty or Thirty: Till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested, the State of Rome, that against these made only defensive War, had leisure to grow, by setting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: That the Gauls never fell upon Italy with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous War. Had they attempted to Conquer it, whilst Pyrrius was travelling in the fame enterprize; or in either of the two former Punic Wars: It may be doubted what would have become of this Imperial City. But it seems that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to use their times: And were therefore like to smart, whensoever the Enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should find leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punic War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold, to set upon the Gauls in their own Country: And that was Three Years before the coming of Pyrrius into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and Besieging Arretium, had won a great Battle, and slain L. Calpis, with the most of his Army. Manlius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about Ransom of Prisoners. But these Embassadors they slew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled their Senones out of their Country, and sent a Colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the (a) Boji, another People of Gaul, to fear the like measure: Who thereupon took Arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great Battles; and thereby made them sue for Peace, which lasted until the end of this Illyrian War.

It vexed the Gauls to see a Roman Colony planted in their Country; who had been accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their Neighbours performance. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinæ (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to us they were nearer; like as they called Cisalpinæ, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: Reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their loss, so their union might recompense it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpinæ and Transalpinæ fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a Tumult, without further trouble of War. Soon after they were urged by a greater indignity to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the People; That, besides one Colony already planned in the Territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to People the whole Country between Arcona and Ariminum: Exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana itself, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joined with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadful Precedent extremely displeased the Boji; who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displacement. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees, the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchy of Milum, joined with the Boji, and upon a common Party entertained the Gefates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gefates having received a great impress, came to the Field under the conduct of their Kings Concalianus and Anoreusius: Who with the Boji, and Insubrians, compound an Army of Fifty Thousand Foot, and Twenty Thousand Horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever (b) crossed the Roman Territory; to whom the Boji, and Insubrians, had had been beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the (c) Cenomani, adhered to the Romans: As better believing in their prosperity and rising fortune. For fear of the worse incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milum: With the rest of their Forces they entered into Tuscan. The Romans immediately hearing of this danger, send Asellinus to Rimini to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Asellus their other Consul, who then was in Country Sardinia, they employ one of their Prætors, for of Milum the defence of Tuscan.

Being at this time greatly troubled with the consideration of this powerful Army, which the Gauls had assembled, they cause a view to be taken, as well of their own Forces, as those of their Allies: Who were no less willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous People; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: Because they sent out the power of the Romans in those days. With the Consuls they sent forth to the War Four Legions of their own: Every Legion consisting of Five Thousand Two Hundred Foot, and Three Hundred Horse; and of their Allies Thirteen Thousand Foot, and Two Hundred Horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabinians and Hetrurians Fifty Thousand Foot, and Four Thousand Horse, which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbris and Sarapinates, which inhabited the Apennines, there were Twenty Thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomani, other Twenty Thousand; which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the General Army of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides the Boji, to be ready against all uncertain chances of War, Thirty Thousand Foot, and Fifteen Hundred Horse, Garrisoned in Rome it self, of their own People, and of their Allies, Thirty Thousand Foot, and Two Thousand Horse. Over and above these great Troops; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent unto the Senate, there were numbered Fourcore Thousand

(C) Pyrrhus and Mitridates seem to be one Nation, who are also called Salmisians, Præstians, Apizians, and Calabrians. The Country is now Apiz, containing the North-west head-land of Calabria. (C) A people of the Kingdom of Naples. (C) Pyrrhus calls them a people of Italy. Foot, and Five Thousand Horse, in that of the Sarmates, Seventy Thousand Foot, and of Horse Seven Thousand, in that of the (g.) Japyges and Mylæneses, Fifty Thousand Foot, and Sixteen Thousand Horse, the Lucani sent a List of Thirty Thousand Foot, and Three Thousand Horse, the (h.) Maris, (i.) Mauris, (k.) Ferrentians, and the Vesvini, of Twenty Thousand Foot, and Four Thousand Horse. The Romans had also Two Legions in Sicily, and about Tarentum, containing Eight Thousand Four Hundred Foot, and Four Hundred Horse. So as of the Romans Campains jointly, reckoning men Armed, and fit to bear Arms, there were Registered Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand Foot, and of Horse Three and Twenty Thousand: Of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an Hundred and Fifty Thousand Foot, and about Six Thousand Horse. Calling up the whole Forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to Seven Hundred Thousand Foot, and Seventy Thousand Horse. But the number is somewhat mis-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himself by the dead Payes; for where he reckons Nine Hundred Horse too many, he falls short Nine Thousand Two Hundred of the Foot.

How great soever this Muster was, it seems to have been like unto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the Twelfth invaded Milan: At what time, the better to encourage himself and his Subjects he took a Roll of all Persons able to bear Arms, within the Dutchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a Tenth part of them into the Field. Certain it is, that the Battels of Trebia, Thyrasene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large account. Yet were the Romans fain to Arm their Slaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Canna. Wherefore the marvel is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified with report of such a Multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmes: Though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter preparations, the Gauls keep on their way: And entering into Tuscany, destroy, and put to fire and Sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the Field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscany, having taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had mislead of them, came again fast after them, to arrest them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: And in the same evening discovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem, that shewed no great favour of Wit, but such as well befitted those that had none other occupation than War, and flood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the Night, they cause their Foot to march away, but not far, leaving their Horse in Guard; to whom they give order to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat; as if they had not dared to abide Battel. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure, as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls return, charge them, and kill Six Thousand upon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themselves, till L. Amilius, being at Arminum, comes to their succour. Upon the coming of the Consul, the Gauls consult, whether they should give the Romans Battel, or forbear. In which dispute, Anorellus, one of their Kings, persuades them, rather to return into their own Countreys; where, after they had disposed of the great spoils and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the War, being without carriage, peltier or other impediment. This advice they all embrace; for, seeing that they were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoils of their Enemies, they thought it wisdom, to hazard neither it, nor themselves any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the Enemy had been in light. But as well in the Wars of these later Ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extrem dangerous to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn head; yet in always going on from the pursuing Enemy, they find within few Miles, either Straight, Hedge, or Ditch, or place of disadvantage, which they are informed to pass in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows it as well as the Captain, that he which forsakes the Field, perceives and fears some advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those fuccours that reason offereth, when it hath once posselt the heart of man, it causeth thence both courage and understanding. They that make retreat, are always in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be engaged: And so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, and perish, if those that favour the retreat be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the Year 1503, upon a retreat made by the Marquis of Sal, doth testify no less. For although a great Troop of French Horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gave the Foot leisure to trot away, yet being retarded by other turnings, the Spanish Foot overtook and defeated them utterly. During the Wars between the Imperials and the French, Bois and Adone were lost at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs fee the Enemy, before they left the Field. So was Strati overthrowen by the Marquis of Marignan, because he could not be persuaded to dislodge the Night before the French King Francis the First wisely: When without respect of points of honour, he dislodge from before Landerley, by Night, as many other the most advised Captains (not finding themselves in case to give Battel) have done. Je ne trouve point (saith the Marshal Montreux) une fois des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retraite. I find nothing in the Art of War so difficult as to make a safe retreat. A sure rule it is that there is less dishonour to dislodge in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue gives this judgment of a days retreat, made in France, presently before the Battel at Montcaumon. For (saith he) staying upon our reputations, in these

not to dislodge by Night; we lost our reputation indeed, by dislodging by day: Whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman Count Lodowick of Nassau, Brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Montcaumon with so great resolution, as he saved the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of which my self was an eye-witness, and was one of them that had cause to thank him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the Enemy, and their faces homeward. Amilius follows them as near as he can, without engaging himself, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Asilius the other Consul, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gauls inclined towards to Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear and Front. To Iulian Amilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milaneses; in the Front they range the Piemontais, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: Which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Asilius the Consul: Who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Comulatus and Anorellus; with Forty Thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the Year following this overthrow, by the new Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to use their Victory: They gave not Ten, Twenty, or Thirty Years time to the Gauls, to repair their Forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Bois; but by reason of the great Ruins that fell, and the great Pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to forsake it. In the Second Year, Furius and Flaminius invade the Milaneses; and prevail very far, being strongly assisted by the Senonians and the Venetiens. Nevertheless these Consuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to resign their Office; because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not only foretold little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving Letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwise advertised of the contents, was not hally to open them: But first gave Battel unto the Enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then pursued the Letters; and returning home obtained a Triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the People, who yet bear him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Countrey of the Senonians among the People of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the People, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by a way of Delegacy, or grand Communion; did not stand highly upon his Birth and Degree, but courted the Multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself and his fellow Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the furer side, and found imitators, that role by the same Art, which in process of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Collegues, being disposed, M. Claudius Marcellus, and C. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that Year. The Gauls about this time desired Peace; and were like to have obtained it: Though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when Thirty Thousand of the Gessates following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyined with the Isabrians: All other discourse, than of present War, was at an end. So the Consul, halted into their Province, where they besieged Acerra, a Town not far from Naples (so far had the Romans pierced already in the Dutchy of Milans.) To divert them from this Siege, Britomarus laid down before Clusidium, a Town in the Lunc Tract, with a great part of his Forces: Leaving the rest, with the Isabrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerra; and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their Siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the Horse, and Six Hundred Foot lightly Armed, thought to deal well enough with those at Clusidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him upon the way: So suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to retreat themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his Game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number; both of Horse and foot: But he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode out single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slew and disarmed Britomarus, in the presence of both Armies: Whereby his own men took such courage, and his Enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great Victory.

This was the Third and last time, that ever any Roman General slew the General of the Enemies, with his own hand. To this kind of Victory, belonged a peculiar Triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cassius, and this Marcellus, had the honour: Yet I dare say, that the Two Scipios, and divers of the Roman Captains, especially Cæsar, were better men of War than any of these Three, though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima spolia, The Armour of a General slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to do.

After this Victory, Acerra was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soon after: With all that belonged to the Cisalpine, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lombardy. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many Years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City it self, brought to nothing in a short time, their pleasant and fertile Territory posselt by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon don their Countreys, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlaws and Thieves. And thus did the Romans spend the Three and Twenty Years following the Peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Janus: Which they never did before, (it standing always open, when they had any War) save once in the Reign of Numa; nor in long time after, until the Reign of Augustus. But this their present happiness was not to last long: A dangerous War, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their Gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the Second Punick War.

SECT. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the Son of Amilcar, was about Six and Twenty Years old, when he was chosen General of the Carthaginian Forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army, as soon as Asdrubal was dead: And the Election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the Third of the Barchine Family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barca) that had command in chief, over the men of War. Which honour would perhaps have been less envied by these Domestical Enemies, if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine House, had not also born the whole sway in Government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the People. This general good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar in saving his Country from imminent ruin, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great revenues; so was it retained by the same good Arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to tax the virtue of their Enemies, that was unreplicable; nor to perform the like services unto the Common-wealth; had nothing left whereby to value themselves, excepting the general reprobation of War, and cautious advice of not provoking the Romans. This they seasoned other-whiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppress the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to bear ill-will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no less Barchine, than Hannibal himself. For it was long since apparent, that the Oath of the Romans, to the Articles of Peace, afforded no security to Carthage, were the never so quiet, and officious; unless the should yield to become their subject. Since therefore the Peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could find some good advantage, to renew the War: It was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their own estate was in good case, the War should begin; than that in some unhappy time of Famine or Pestilence, or after some great loss of Army or Fleet, they should be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their Enemies; and to give away safely their Lands and Treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, upon terms of disadvantage.

This disposition of his Country-men, Hannibal well understood. Neither was he ignorant (for his Father, and other Friends, had long time devised of this business) that in making War with the Romans, it was no small advantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without molestation; there was good hope that he should find friends and assistance, even of those People, that helped to increase the Roman Armies in foreign Wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to hear that he had set the War on foot, would nevertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discomfited, in procuring allowance for the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay Siege unto Saguntum, which might seem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignity of that Spanish Towns alliance with her half Friends. So should he assay both the patience of his Enemies, and the disposition of his own Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he nevertheless went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Livie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the war against Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by course of business. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needful to finish the conquest of the rest, before he did any thing that should provoke the Romans. First therefore he entered upon the Territory of the Oleades; and having besieged Alibea (Livie called it Castelli) their chief City, he became, in a few days, Master not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he first undertook, being subdued, and the winter at hand, he refted his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagina, and imparted liberally to the Soldiers, the spoils he had gotten in his late Conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the war against the Paceti, and without any great difficulty, won first Salmantica, now called Salamancia; and after it, Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficulty. But in this return, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martial Judgment. For all such of the Paceti, as were able to bear arms, before the late misdeeds by the spoil of their Country, with those of Salamancia, and of the Oleades, that had escaped in the late overthrow, joining themselves with the Toletani; compounded an Army of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbon in Portugal. These four Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never saw an enemy, upon whom he durst not give charge; were thoroughly resolved, that his natural valour would at this time no less neglect the cold advice of discomfition, than at other times it had seemed to do, when the like great occasion perswaded him to use it. But he that makes himself a body of Crystal, that all men may look thorow him, and discern all the parts of his disposition, makes himself (whilst) an Ass: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wife men, though they have single hearts in all that is just and virtuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottoms: which when others look into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtle Carthaginian, when he served under Asdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the most adventurous: but that which may befit a Captain, or inferior Commander, doth not always become a Chief; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great-ones, as have been found more fortunate than wit. At this time, our great Man of war knew as well how to dissemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himself from the River-side, as if fearful to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should thrust themselves in fury and disorder, into the swift stream, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defences on the contrary side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well-near over, he turned back his Elephants to encertain them at their landing, and thrust his Horse-men, both above and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kind of Lances, which they held in the midst of the river, had such an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their strokes, clattered together; and unable to move or shift their bodies, as on firm ground, that they flew all those (in manner) without resistance, which were already entered into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed; with so great a slaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines perceiving the danger towards them, cried before they were hurt. They sent Embassadors to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeed, only because of alliance and friendship with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cry out, that War should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africa. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carried it. So it was only concluded; that Embassadors should be sent into Spain, to view the face of their then confederates: which were indeed none other than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended war against Rome, it was likely that he should give them, as were long, a more plausible occasion to take Arms against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power to determine what they liked themselves, upon the report of these Embassadors; and this their gravity, in being not too rash at first, would serve to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadors Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius an Historian of sincerity less questionable, tells, that they found him at Carthagina, and had conference with him, though such as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibals whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptory Embassy (as Livie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the covenants of Peace, if they had rejected that which was sent, upon any other pretence than prevention of war.

Whilst the Embassadors passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should do as the Mamertines in Sicily had done, for the Romans; and implore his help against the Saguntines. These were the Tardetani, a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, and having many quarrels with them (as happens commonly among neighbours) of which Hannibal himself hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first provoked him ere he meddled with them, he made no more ado, but fate down with his whole power before their Town. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions:

not only because the War, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrel; as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their own. Yet were they not hasty to threaten, before they were ready to strike, but meant to tempt, until they had an Army in readiness to send into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Iblyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himself over-straitly tied up by them, with hard conditions; or rather because he was of an unthankful disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the fame of the Carthaginian war, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kind, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece; against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and seized upon some places, that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, he might have sped better. For the business which the Gauls was ended; with Hannibal, not thoroughly begun, when he declared himself by his doings, enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Æmilius, was sent against him who in seven days won the strong Town of Dimitium; and thereby brought forth terror upon the Country round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yield themselves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which he might have done long, if the head-headed Rebel had not been too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Army in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert, presenting himself the next morning with twenty ships before the Town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul, and was soon intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a Greek, where he had shipping ready for him, and embarked himself: leaving all his estate unto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This business, though it were soon dispatched, yet prevented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal lay down, as Æmilius was landed in Iblyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the brave sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their General received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many days unable to move. Nevertheless, he was not unmindful of his work in the mean while; but gave order to raise certain movable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was given: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which upon the first fury they had won; but they were pursued even to their own trenches and camp. Nevertheless the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thousand men, did so weary the Town-men with continual travel, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindered from taking full possession of the City, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himself out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered were so severe, and without all compals of honour, as Alcon durst not return to propound them to his Country-men. For Hannibal demanded all that they had, gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the City: yea, the City it self to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assign some other place for their habitation: not allowing them to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustain themselves, than the cloaths on their backs; or other arms, to defend them, than their nails and teeth. Yet might they far better have submitted themselves unto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might have enjoyed their lives, and saved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have resorted at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soon after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were deflowered before their own faces; and all put to the sword, that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and fell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves up like most wretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had: so dying unrevengeed. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept wherewith to pay his Army: the slaves and other booty, he divided among his Soldiers, reserving some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

These tydings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slowness, in forbearing to send help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking still for succour, but in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their honour, by taking sharp revenge. To this end they sent Embassadors again to Carthage: demanding only, Whether it were by general consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made war upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to give them Demetrius. Hercunto answer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their second Embassage, howsoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required justice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-Wealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the General of our Army in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, have only followed his own counsel; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is the question which the Romans ought to ask us. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is, Whether it were lawful or unlawful for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belong to us, to call our own own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lulitani the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement between you and Afrubal, wherein you will say that the Saguntines were comprehended by that particular, that have taught us how to answer for that. For whatsoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lulitani, to your own disadvantage, you cast it upon your Consuls presumption as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and people of Rome. If then it be lawful for the Romans, to disavow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and precise warrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selves no way bound in honour to perform those bargains which Afrubal hath made for us, without our commandment and consent.

This was an impatient answer, and little better than a meer cavil. For Lulitani the Consul, in his Treaty of Peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better to have dealt plainly, and to have alleged, That after this League was made and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withal of twelve hundred talents: which able, would reverse with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inferred their names into the Treaty of Peace with Afrubal: seeing that the Treaty with Afrubal, and all other business between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoever we require, else will we make War, without regard of our Oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not allege, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Levi himself doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of revenge: we may reasonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not so much upon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up such ancient matter of quarrel, to shew that the war, now towards, had long been thought in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embassadors, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purposes of those that sent them, and the worth of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iblyria; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the skirt of his Gown, as if somewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cried out at once: Even which of them you your self have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and there it among you: Which the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each party had resolved to make War, it was merely frivolous. For all these disputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to sustain the War. The rusty sword, and the empty purse, do always plead performance of Covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwise understood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (seeing Peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kind of breathing) the best advised have rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonians with the French in Navarre; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, who he wrote to Strasbourg, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the War broke out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the second of Spain, with the English, when in the great Embarge he took all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from these enemies, had another private and hereditary desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had solemnly bound him by Oath, to pursue them with immortal hatred, and to work them all possible mischief, as soon as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father caused him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marvel if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge of their Predecessors, that as soon as their Coasters shall be able, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

SECT. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain; and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WAR being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved not to put up his sword which he had drawn against the Saguntines, until he had therewith opened his passage unto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punic War; second to none that ever the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthage; where he licenced his Spanish Soldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves against the Spring. In the mean while he gave instructions to his Brother Afrubal for the Government of Spain in his absence. He also took order, to send a great many Troops of Spaniards into Africk, to equal the number of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that to the one Nation might remain as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteen thousand, eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Belareti. Besides these, he selected four thousand foot, all young men, and of quality, out of the best Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garisoned in Carthage it self, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serve for hostages: for among those four thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that wayward most in their several States, had their Sons or Kinsmen. He also left with his Brother, to guard the Coast and Ports, fifty and seven Gallies, whereof thirty seven were presently armed, and appointed for the war. Of African and other Nations, strangers, he left with him above twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africa; he sent discoverers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Alps. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminish his force, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and Discoverers being returned with good satisfaction, in the beginning of the Spring, he pass'd over the River of Iberus, with an Army consisting of fourscore and ten thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse. All those parts of Spain into which he had not entered before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who fate still at Carthage) to govern Spain on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, some of his Spanish Soldiers returned home without asking leave, which that they might not also do, or at least, he courtuously dismissed many more that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to pass, that the Journey seemed the less tedious unto those that accompanied him, as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Army, consisting now but of fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he pass'd the Pyrenes, and entered into Gaul. He found the Gauls that bordered upon Spain, ready in Arms to forbid his entrance into their Country; but won them with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the bank of Rhodanus, where dwell, on each side of the River, a people called Velce. These were unacquainted with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keep him from passing over the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vivaretz and Lynnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Country of Dauphiné, thinking to defend the further bank against him: yet such as remained, being very desirous to free their Country of so many ill guests, were better pleased to have their Country-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own fowls of corn and cattle wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boats; informed him of another more easy passage, higher up the River; and lent him Guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Army were in readiness; he sent Hanno, the son of Romilear, up the River; himself in the mean while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was, that Hanno charging the Gauls unawares upon their own side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the River in their faces, the further bank was won, though with some difficulty; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants, who marvellously feared the water. He was therefore driven to make rafts of trees, and cover them with Earth and Turf; whereof he fastened one to each bank, that might serve as a bridge, and from another of the same sort, but loose, upon which the beasts were towed over.

Having pass'd this first brunt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Picmont and Malon, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alps; that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he received Guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himself extremely incumbered by the Saguntines; and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countries on the other side. And whereas his Journey over the Mountains cost him fifteen days travel, he was every day, more or less, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withal extremely beaten with grievous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this passage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territory; gave them great comfort and encouragement to go on; having nothing else of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to overcome, by their proper valour and resolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and resistance.

SECT. III.

How the Romans in vain solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part. The Rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.

THE Countries of Spain and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the war at Carthage. These, as they were intrusted by the Senate, took Spain in their way, home-ward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to disswade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted were the Velcians, a people in Spain from whom, in open assembly, they received by one that spoke for the rest, this uncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans persuade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, have been utterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else have held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Yet may therefore be gone, with this resolution from us. That for our parts (and so I think, I may assure for the rest of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindness at our hands, who are resolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Velcians, the Embassadors took their way towards the Gauls; using their best arguments to persuade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to pass into Italy through their Territory: and withal greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laugh't them to scorn, and had hardly the patience to hear them speak. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibal's passage into Italy, entrain a war which is not meant to be made against us? Shall we hold the war among our selves, and in our own Territory, by force which marcheth with a speedy pace from us, toward our ancient enemies? Have the Romans desired to well of us, and the Carthaginians to ill, that we should set fire on our own houses, to save theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance: and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians our enemies, who have no way as yet declared us, nor we them.

With this unpleasant answer the Embassadors returned home, carrying no good news, of friends likely to help them; but rather some assurance from the people of Massilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gauls gave hafty proof. For when the news was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had pass'd Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stir up the Bois, and Infubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand, they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it seems they could not win; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners (who belike were abroad in the Country) to fly to Modena: where they besegged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their hostages in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a Peace; whom they detained. Mantius the Praetor, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste, to the relief of the besieged. But the Gauls, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Praetor opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered by fast running to a little village, but defensible by upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Attilius, another of the Praetors, was hastily sent to relieve the besieged with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman allies: which forces were taken out of the Consul's Army, and supplied by a new levy.

As the Gauls were too rash and hafty, so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war. They were not persuaded that Carthage, which had almost fervently endured for many indignities in time of the late peace; would be so brave and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy it self. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls to make war in Spain, the other in Africa: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africa, with an hundred and sixty Quinquageme, or Gallies of five to an Oar, which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, to which the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the wind aloft favourable, as in five days he recovered Massilia. There he was advertised of Hannibal's having pass'd the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found butte yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also news of the Consul's arrival: whereof he was neither, glad nor sorry, as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians, Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten; yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred, and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three days before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to look upon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended Voyage into Spain. Nevertheless he sent away thither his Brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to try what might be done against Asdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in the Country. He himself, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea, to Pisa; and by passing thorough Tuscan into Lombardy, drew together the broken troops of Mantius and Attilius that lately had been beaten by the Gauls; with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travel of his painful Journey.

SECT. IV.

Scipio the Roman Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battle at Trebia.

FIVE Months Hannibal had spent in his tedious Journey from Carthage; when great matter he could make, when he had pass'd the Alps, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot, at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only twenty thousand foot and six hundred horse. Hannibal himself in his monument which he raised, in the Temple

Temple of Juno Lucina, agreeeth with the latter fumm. Yet the Gauls, Ligurians, and others that joyed with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Army, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the Banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembered by himself in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished by diseases, Enemies, Rivers and Mountains; which mischief he had devoured, each their several throes.

Having newly passed the Alps, and scarce refreshed his wearied Army in the Country of Piemont; he sought to try the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held war at that time with the Isurians, which were his good friends, and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amity. Wherefore he assaulted their Town, and won it by force in three daies. Their spoil served well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unto his side: many for fear, many also for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ran thorough the whole Country: which joyed, or was all in readines to joyn with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio the Consul his arrival, made some to be more advised than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten thorough the most defendible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approach; many fate still for very fear, who else would faine have concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater fear, offered their service against the Carthaginians, whom nevertheless they had wished well to speed.

This wavering affection of the Provinces, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals hasten to the tryal of a battel. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange that the Consul, whom he had left behind him on the other side of the Alps, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himself in the Plains; Scipio admiring the strange adventure of passing those Mountains, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibal's success, and sudden arrival. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all hast unto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicily, giving him to understand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the war in Africa, it was now their pleasure that he should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that he should return the Army under his charge, with all possible speed, to save Italy itself. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Livium, with direction to Land the Army at Adrium, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: making another way from Carthage, whether he was quite half. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so near, that fight they must, ere they could part afunder. Hereupon both of them prepared the minds of their Soldiers, by the best arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed upon certain prisoners of the Saraceni, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, having been no less miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withal so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be delivered from their miseries by any kind of present death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slain, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chiefs of the Gauls were wont to use in single combats. Every one of those unhappy men wished, that his own lot might speed; whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by Victory. That couple, whose the good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death, and having none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poor creatures were willing, upon whatsoever uneven terms, to rid themselves out of slavery. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also upon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the Victory had gotten his liberty, together with all horse and armour: but even him also, who being slain in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their General perceiving what impression this dumb shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their own condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their own estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to run the fate fortune, that these slaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetual slavery: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himself any hope of life by flight; since the Mountains, the Rivers, the great distance from their own Countries, and the pursuit of merciless Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their own case; seeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own soil, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many ways to save themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withal, could no way entertain such a resolution as this: seeing the same Necessity, (to which nothing seems impossible) did no way press them, or constrain them. In this fort did Hannibal, with one substantial Argument, that there was no mean between Victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captain of France) La commodité de la retraite avance la fuite; La commodité de la retraite, doit greatly advance a fast running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticinum, did not neglect to use the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army by telling: putting them in mind of the great conquests and and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than that of Carthaginians, whom in their late war they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withal to consider, that at this time it was not only diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a Troop of Brigands and Thieves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but to weather-beaten, and starved, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustain the first charge that should be given upon them. Nay (saith he) ye your selves may make judgement what during they have now remaining, after so many wars and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Rear, their horsemen were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himself, fearing our approach, ran headlong towards the Alps: thinking it a less dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharp Swords of the Romans, which had to often cut down his people, both in Africa, and in Sicily. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the grofs of his Army, with his Horse; and the Romans having also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discovered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horse-men of the Gauls, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground between their Troops, to assist them: himself with his Roman men at arms, following softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to try the metal of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their loss that should have aided them, flunk at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without causing a Dart, for fear of being trodden down by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backed. Neither was the Consul unmindful to relieve them: their hardiness deserving his aid; and the hasty flight of those that should have stood by them, admonishing him that it was needful. Wherefore he adventured himself so far, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been left in the place, if his Son (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slave. Whilst the Romans were busied in helping their Consul; an unexpected storm came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to give upon the Romans in flank, and to compass them about, whilst he with his men at Arms sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ran away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose looks were fastened upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were thrust together, and routed: so that they all betook them to their speed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horse-men thus beaten, and the rest of his Army thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of wisdom, having lost so many of his Fleet upon the first puff of the wind, to take Rear with therelf, before the extremity of the tempest overtook him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battel of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner stole the retreat; and recovered the Bridge over Ticinum, which he had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left six hundred of his Rear behind him: who were the last that should have passed, and staid to break the Bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of War, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripit fugam: Jigis enim aliquando laudanda: quæ which must be understood in this sort: If a General of an Army, by some unprosperous beginnings doubt the success, or find his Army fearful or wavering, it is more profitable to treat a false retreat, than to abide the uncertain event of battel.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could pass the River; Scipio the whilst refreshing his men, and easing himself of his wound in Placentia. But as soon as Hannibal presented his Army before the Town, offering battel to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Camp; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-deferred time was come, in which better Chiefs and Soldiers, than Antiochus, Brytannicus, and Geslaris, were come to help them: that they had the hearts to help themselves. Wherefore they left their camp, and followed the Roman Camp; wounded and lame, especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and presented their service. Hannibal received them exceeding courteously, and dismissed them to their own places: as men likely to be of more use to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other service at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul stole a retreat, as he had done before; but not with the like ease and security. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, sent the Numidians after him: following himself with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoil, had not staid to ransack their Camp: and thereby given time to all (save some few in Rear, that were slain or taken) to pass the River of Trebia, and save themselves. Scipio, being both unable to travel by reason of his wound, and withal, finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consul, incamps himself strongly upon the banks of Trebia. Needfully required that he should do so, yet this diminished his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian side; among whom came in the Bois, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Infurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeem their own hostages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceived better hope of recovering their own men and lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clasidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundisian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The news of their disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and people, rather with a desire of hasty revenge, than any great sorrow for their loss received; seeing that in a manner, all their Foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hurried away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Arminius, where the Army, by him sent out of Sicily, awaited his coming. He therefore hastened thither; and from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joined in one, the Consuls devised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius received from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal's arrival; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled, which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treason of the Gauls.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the state of the affairs in those parts; fought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio was recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himself the sole glory of the victory, which he had already in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the Election of the new Consuls: his own time being well-near expired. But Scipio perceived the contrary; objecting the unskillfulness of the new-come Soldiers; and withal, gave him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally unconstant, were upon terms of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Ty, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to find out the dishonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and loss of time. For the strength of his Army, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no less feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own home, had many passions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out, that about the same time, the Gauls, inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was told to be his own Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fly to the Romans for help; and so make their tale the better, saying that this wrong is done them, because they refused to join with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falsehood, and was assured of their unfaithfulness. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injury; and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand Horse: which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal's his foragers, and finding them heavy laden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own Camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians fall out against them, who caused them more pain than they came. Sempronius was not so lucky to lack his own men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length all the Roman Army was drawn forth, and a battle ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory (for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in general desirous to try the main chance in open field: all the persuasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gauls, his Spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the victory by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a water-course, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choice Horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their Camp, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning he had sent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and to draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his Camp, but forded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arm-holes: which, together with the want of food, did to enfeeble and cool their courages, as they wanted force to handle the arms they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latins: having of the one sixteen, of the other twenty thousand. The masts of these they ranged in a grove Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse, thrusting their Light-armed, and Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodness. When therefore the Roman horse ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot, were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gauls and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares preft in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies' swords: and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the Horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompensed with the loss that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champain, being by far inferior in Horse and withal, thereby subject to the African Elephants which inclosed or uneven grounds and wood-lands, would have been of no use. His second error was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought; whereby he was grossly over-reach'd, and inforced, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his foot-men with empty stomachs, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one faith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous than to present an Army eyed with travel, to an enemy fresh and fed, since where the strength of body faileth, the generosity of mind is as an unsupportable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, because of the showers; or would not perceive him, because they were over-wearied. Sempronius elapsed with extreme danger, flying through the Country that was over-run by the enemies' horse. He was attended by more than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer than could have made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

SECT. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Consul slain, and his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Trasymene.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very sharp, and unfit for service: to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keep the field, lay warm in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet; but vexed them with continual Alarms, assaulted divers places, and taking some, beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his party, who presented him, in token of their faithful love, with two Roman Quæstors, or Treasurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. Thence, and in general all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he led in straight places, laden with Irons, and miserably fed: those of their followers he not only well treated, but sent them to their Countries without ransom; with the protestation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his party and assistance. But the Gauls were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in fear, lest he should make their Country the seat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason would them, at his feeding upon them, and waiving their territory. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life, others admonished him of the danger: and these that gave him the advice, were ready soon after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to use Periwigs of hair, and false beards of divers colours: to the end that he might not be detected, nor known, to those that should undertake to make him away. Fain he would have passed the Appennine, upon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had seen more favourable than one. At length, when the year was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leave of these giddy companions, and bring the war nearer to the gate of Rome. So away he went, having his Army greatly increased with Ligurians and Gauls; more serviceable friends abroad, than in their own Country. That the passage of the Appennine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needless to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling thow and over them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of winter, that makes all waies foul, than to any intolerable difficulty in that journey. Nevertheless, to avoid the length of war, together with the resistance and fortifications which may not be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travel thorow the Fens and rotten grounds of Trifanc. In those Marshes and bogs, he lost all his Elephants, save one, together with the use of one of his eyes; by the moistness of the air, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading thorow deep mire and water. In brief, after he had, with much ado, recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium; where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard news of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this year. Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be served to again, unless he quickly finished the war. This jealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entered into his Office, lest his adversaries, by feigning some religious impediment, should detain him within the City, or find other business for him at home, to displace him from the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town, and meant to take possession of the Field when the day came at Arminius. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and hastening to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assistance and victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman, hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Country between Felsule and Arretium, he put to fire and sword, even under the Consul's nose; which was enough to make him stir, that would not have been still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captain of France hath said; Pays gaste n'est pais gardé; A wasted Country is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own honour to be much impaired, and therefore, advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear; saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians were burning down all Italy before him, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensigns stuck to fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest, saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded that it should be dug up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withal, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousy, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

discretion and danger, than to pursue misfortune: it wasteth it self sooner by succurance, than by opposition. It is the invading Army that desires battle: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to cross the Apennines, and to fall upon the most rich and pleasant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be persuaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battle: but he suffered two week in horse, he always kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns flood firm for the Romans, whose Legions were in fight, though after off; he resolved to rest his Army, that was laden with spoil, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following spring. But ere this can be done he must pass along by the Dictators Camp, that hung over his head upon the hills of Collicula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly garden-country, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of provision for his wintering. It was by meer error of his guide, that he first entered within their streights. For he would have been directed into Casilinum, whence he might both, stay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promises under-hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide mis-undrestood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him away another way, from Casilinum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit: as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himself by a slight invention, yet serving the turn as well as a better. In driving the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose horns he dressed with dry figgots, and setting fire to them in the dark night, caused them to be driven up the hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them, and ran therefore hastily away, thinking the enemies were behind their backs; and falling among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no less afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army recovered sure ground without molestation: where he staid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the City, whilst the Carthaginians waited all the Plains. The Carthaginians took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-houses for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some business of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his own sufficiency. He was fully persuaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtilty and ambush, which he thought himself wise enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that for canelity, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Soldiers, in worthiness to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden so to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extremum peril of death. But the honor of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; and the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at home bearing office in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, took he the matter never so haughtily. Hannibal on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more adventurous Gamester. Therefore he drew near, and to provoke the Romans, sent forth the third part of his Army to waste the Country. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had to overcome. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plain force, won it from them the next day; and intrenching himself thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his Horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good heart against the next Summer: besides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his own men, terrify his enemies, and give him leave to forage the Country at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many days issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battle to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the foragers, who being dispersed over all the fields, and laden with booty, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakness, which held him within his Camp, and therefore were bold to despise his great name; that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Adrabal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to take fight against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not so much hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the news, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own Camp; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: saying that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyful of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearful of greater danger, thence likely to ensue. He said that he knew his own place, and what was to be done: that he would teach the Master of the Horse to do so likewise, and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good success issuing from bad counsel, was more to be feared, than calamity; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Against these Sermons every one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which office warranted him to speak, and do what he list, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greatest necessity hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unless he also hinder others, from doing better than himself can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forbore to spoil some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into envy and suspicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the War to last long, that he himself might be long in office, and have the sole Government both of our City and Armies. This must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should again take it from him and confer it upon one more worthy. But left, in moving the people hereto, I should seem to do him injury; thus far forth I will regard his honour: I will only propose, That the Master of the Horse may be joined in equal authority with the Dictator, as things not more new, nor less necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the people.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill pertwaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficial at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to think that his general intent, and care of the Weal-publicque, was less than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand up, and formally deliver his approbation, not one of the principal Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both unto a worthy Personage, and (therewithal) unto that dignity, whose great power had freed the State at several times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Praetor, was glad of such an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the son of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew by often bragging, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor men's causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being advanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baseless. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot invective, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobility, saying, That it grieved them to see the people do well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they fought to humble the Commons by poverty, and to impoverish them by War; especially by War at their own doors, which would soon consume every poor mans living, and find him no other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wife; and since they had found one (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected unto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deserts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Aet passed.

Before this busy day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of new Consul, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius; and, having finished all requisite business, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude in hindering the decree. The news of Minutius his advancement, was at the Camps soon at Edius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Collegue, began to treat with him as a Companion; as ing him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successively, for some longer time, should command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the Horse equal to the Dictator, but that he should never be his superior. He would therefore divide the Legions with him by lot, according to the custom. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with half of the Army he could not work such wonders as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Nevertheless he meant to do his best, and so taking his part from the Dictator, incamped about a mile and a half from the Dictator. Needful it was (though Livy seems to tax him for it) that he should do so. For where two several Commanders are not subordinate one unto another, nor joined in Commission, but have each intire and absolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies; in which regard, one Camp shall not hold them both without great inconvenience. Polybius never finds fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief successively (as the two Consuls used) with Minutius, by turns. He saith that Minutius was very refractory, and so proud of his advancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to have command over all by course. This is likely to be true. For Naumes impatient of subjection when once they have broken loose from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to contest with it; as if herein consisted the proof and assurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Master of the horse to make good the opinion which was thus advanced him. Therefore he was no less careful of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, fired, could not long be wanting. The Country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoining, had many and spacious caves; able some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot, thrusting them to close together, that they could not be discovered. But left by his misadventure they should be found out, and torrid in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand; whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needful care, to business little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which not long before had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like fort as he got it; he sent first his lightarmature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his own Troops with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any life to retain. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves losing many, and those of their best men; Fabius drew near in every good order to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving afar off, unto what extremity his new Colleague had rashly thrown himself and his followers, did the Office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to improve himself by failing to do good, than by suffering his enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well warded with a shower, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the hill-tops, Minutius forthwith submitted himself to Fabius, by whose benefit he confided his life to have been saved. So from this time forwards the war proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilst his Office lasted which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vain a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italy; took hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed over into Africa; and there negligently falling to spoil the Country, was himselfe been aboard his ships, with the loss of 1000. men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicily, and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the Camp, with his fellow-Consul, where they took charge of the Army.

SECT. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the war quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces levied against Hannibal. Hannibal takes the Romans provisions in the Castle of Canus. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome hear the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custom; since it was never heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man to discharge the grief and anger of his own private loss, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This affliction of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his own worth being little or none; and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commonalty were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Publius Furius, then Tribune of the People, who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, that Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; that Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two; but, had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius when he commanded over all as Master of the horse. That without a Plebeian Consul, the war would never be brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians as had long since been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobility; and contemned the meaner sort, ever since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needful to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meek new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could with more, than to keep it, by well deserving of them. By such persuasions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to see a man raised for none other virtue, than his detaching from their honour; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose; and he again deposed either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum took name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in use at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens or Decuries; and governed successively, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order: yet so, that the Lillors, or Virgirs, carrying the Falces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only upon the chief of them with those Ensigns of power. This custom was retained in times of the Consuls; and put in use, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old old year, to substitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to slip five daies, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the multitude was commonly well allayed. Upon such change of those, that were Presidents of the election, it was also lawful unto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed: but a time limited, wherein they should publicly declare themselves to seek those offices. But no device would serve against the general favour born unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed over, and the malice of the Fathers, against the worthy man (as it was believed) of this mean, but worthy man, seemed to manifest, that when the People had urged the business to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiency and reputation, should be joyned with him, as both Companion and Opposite. So L. Cæcilius Paulus, he who a few daies had since overcome the Ilyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdom, was urged by the Nobility to stand for the place; which he easily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not therefore of this honourable man, to trouble himself any more in such great business of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good service, He, and M. Livius that had been his companion in office, were afterwards injuriously vexed by the people, and called unto judgment: where Livius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly escaped. But of this injustice they shall put the Romans well in mind each of them in his second Consulship wherein they shall honourably approve their worthy; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grievous loss; the other bravely winning, in the most happy victory that ever befall that Common-wealth.

The new Consuls, Varro and Paulus omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the war; wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he would work, and that he would ask no more, than once to have sight of Hannibal, which he promised to vanquish the very first day: yet the providence and care of Paulus travelled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote unto the two old Consuls Servilius and Æmilius, desiring them to abstain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might find the four old Legions well accustomed to the enemy, and the enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Masters, wherein the whole Senate alit him so carefully, as if in this action they meant to reure the flanders, with which Terentius and his adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised, it is uncertain. Four score thousand foot, at the least, and six thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Here the old King of Syracuse, as he had received the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now lend help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barly, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own estate would fall to ruin, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly balanced. He gave them also counsel, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Octavius the Pætor, which was to go into Sicily, that he should accordingly pass over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger attempt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twenty five thousand, with L. Publius Albinus, another of the Pætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of their present strength might well embolden them to do as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Ilyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip hereafter began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Ilyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven upon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilst the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could without incurring the necessity of a battle. Many skirmishes they had with him, wherein they succeeded, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the misery following. Hannibal for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans to be near him lodged about Canusium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all necessities, to the loss of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Canus: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal was, and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his enemies to want many needful things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his Horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battle, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand how this Piece taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needful, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battle with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheless answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet awhile: for that the Confuls would shortly be there, with a Power sufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the year commodious to take the field, the two Confuls, with their Army, set forth against Hannibal. This was always done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to war against any noble or redoubted enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good success and Victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, (not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Volunteers, for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Publius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to do his Country remarkable service. Terenius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens, a troop not less in greatness, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to have exhorted his Consul Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous folly of his fellow-Consul. The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would do his best for his Country, but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would think it less harmful to adventure upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

SECT. VIII.

Diffension between the two Roman Confuls. whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans press'd him to fight. The great battle of Cannæ.

These new Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismistr'd M. Attilius, one of the last years Confuls, requesting it because of his age and weakness: Servilius they retained with them, as their assistant. The first thing that Attilius thought necessary, was to hearten his Souldiers with good words, who out of their bad success hitherto, had gathered, more cause of fear, than of courage. He willed them to consider not only now, their victories in time past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers; which were no less than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. He told them in what danger their Country stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; using some such other common matter of persuasion. But the most effectual part of this Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stollen the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithal he taxed the inconsiderate rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, until he was surrounded by them, the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkness whereof he went groping (as it were blind-fold) into their snares. Finally declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them, he exhorted them to play the men, and do their best. They were easily persuaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman virtue in matter of Arms, gave them cause to think, that under a Captain so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Attilius was known to be, they should easily prevail against the Carthaginians, that came short of them in all things else, save craft, which would not always thrive. But in one thing they mistook the meaning of their General. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, having preconceived a victory, thought all delays to be impediments; and thereby sought to rob themselves of their best help, which was, Good conduct. They remembered what talk they had heard at Rome; and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the war quickly, where-in since Attilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to use it? Thus* thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terenius; who was no less popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is always tedious, and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtful passions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terenius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans think themselves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffension of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Attilius would do too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must be shortly dislodged, and remove hence, into places less fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last years provisions, return into Campania to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varro) favour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth favour no less of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Attilius lodged six miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat uneven. Thinking if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to find them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out of Italy. But they came not. Terenius therefore the next day descended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheless, he gave down close by Hannibal, who, as an unbidden guest, gave him but a rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armatures, fell upon the Roman Vant-couriers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilst it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loss, for that the Romans had among their Pelles, fine troops weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Attilius, who could not handsonly withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Ausidus; leaving a third part of his forces over the water, to lye upon the Eastern bank, where they entrenched themselves. He never was more unwilling to fight than at this present; because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occasion should draw him to more equal terms. Therefore he retired not out of his Trenches, but fortified himself, expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Cerynus, Cannæ, or some other place, where his force lay, for want of necessities: whereof an Army foraging the Country, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Lucius differed much in his relation from Polixenus; telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of base courtes that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (said Lucius) but ten days provision of meat. He had not money to pay his Souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that he knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Proviant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run over to the Romans side. Yea Hannibal himself was once upon the point, to have stollen away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot upon their miserable deficiencies. At length for lack of all other counsel, he resolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithful Souldiers might find the more difficulty in running from him, and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilst he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they even forced him to that, which he most desired, even to fight a battle upon open Champaign ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Lucius, to speak the best of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their own great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he said, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam (i. e. de fuge), Hannibal (i. e. de fuge) to have brought himself off flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of hearsay; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the process it self; it is ery incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, thorow the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could find victuals enough, and all things needful unto his Army, the Summer fore going; what should hinder him to do the like this year; especially since he had paid the careful Husband in making a great harvest; since he had long been Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions? Suitable hereto is all the rest.

If Hannibal had taken nothing but Corn and Cattel, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his Stock, since he came into that Country, that he had armed his African Souldiers; all Roman-like, and loaded his followers with spoil: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easy to do the like. In this point therefore we are to attend the general agreement of Historians; who give it as a principal commendation unto Hannibal, That he always kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no less different in manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he to do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men to ever fought bravely with an enemy was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly professed and swore, besides other rewards, to make many of them as should deserve and seek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senseless device. Hannibal being there with his whole Army, took for little pleasure in the Country and people, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his horse? or could he be trusted, either there, or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to live, having betrayed all his Army, and relinquished his miserable folk to the butchery of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Lucius. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians love to extol their own Country-men, and where a loss cannot be diffembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the enemy, and given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgovernment of their own forces: as if they might easily have won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lay incamped on the River Ausidus. Varro was persuaded, that it concerned him in honour to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vain to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to use his own authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the first break of the day he began to pass the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morning. But Paulus came to him, and fought, as in former times, to have dissuaded him from putting the estate of his Country to a needless hazard. Against those words and substantial arguments, Terenius could allege none other than point of honour. Hannibal had presented them battle at their Trenches: should they endure this Bravado? He had sent his Nuvidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Camp; and drove them shamefully to run within their defences, which also they made offer to assail: Must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier, which as yet was lively, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Attilius perceived that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behind, in the greater Camp opposite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches (which out of his paucity he was less able to space from the battle, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do such accidents) terrify and distract the enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Consuls went over the water with their Army to the Licker Camp, whence also they drew forth their men, and raged them in order of battle: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause, and without any delay, possid likewise over, somewhat higher up the stream, which ran from the South, leaving in his own Camp so many, as he thought would serve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; he bade them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joynt battle with the Romans upon such a level ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to prevail? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither, and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into necessity of playing for their lives, where they are free to lose them. As for these Romans, it was tain to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may even encourage your selves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as seen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul, and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy, both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many hours past, ye shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this, his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal asked him, what news; and what work they were likely to have with these Romans? Work enough (answered Mago) for they are a horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (said Hannibal) replied I tell thee, Brother, that among them all, I search them out diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him, which gladdened the Souldiers, who thought their General would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thousand Romans; or whether he imagined, that the Romans were no less troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the sad mood of his Brother with a jest, and shew himself merry unto the Souldiers: this his answer was more marvellous, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himself had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battle of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fifth: saying, That of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed, enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away,

Even such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serve many times, when battle is in hand, to work upon such passions, as must govern more of the business: especially, where other needful care is not wanting; without which they are but vain boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himself, expressing no less perfection of his military skill, than was greatness in his spirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiousness of the place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his enemies to battle; he marshalled his Army in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might do his best service. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, he sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose Troops, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name, Enfants Perdues; but when we use our own terms, the forlorn-hope. The grofs of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymore, or elsewhere; and well trained in the use of those weapons that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings very deep in file. Between these he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed each after their own Country manner; their shields alike; but the Gauls using long broad swords, that were forcible in a down-right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gauls, naked from their navel upwards, as confident in their own fierceness; the Spaniards, wearing white Callicocks embroidered with Purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant shew, and terrible, because strange. The Gauls were strong of body, and furious in giving charge, but soon wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that came of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were less eager, but more wary; neither affirmed to give ground, when they were over-pressed, nor afraid to return, and renew the fight, upon any small encouragement. As the roughness of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; so the place which they held in this battle, added confidence joyfully unto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conquests, and in Gaul, by this their present War. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity should fall upon them, whilst the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to employ the utmost of their hardiness, as knowing that the enemy could not press far upon them, without further engaging himself than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginians had in horse; by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but no greater, nor so lively, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused the Gauls and Spaniards to advance, leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall back, when they should be over-hardly pressed. So, casting them them into the form of a Crescent. He made them as it were his Vanguard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as serving only to guide it orderly back, when need should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened and thickened against all impression. The circle herself seemed to have been so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behind it; though such figures, cut in brass, as I have seen of this Battle, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to second the Gauls and Spaniards when they were driven to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person found between the last ranks of his long Battalions, and in the head of his Rear, doubtless well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battalion and the River Asdrubal, were the Gauls and Spanish horse, under the command of Asdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Lucius faith Muharbel), with the Nuamid light-horse. Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, and the leading of the Rear. The whole sum of Hannibal's Army in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot, his enemies having two to one against him in foot; and He, five to three against them in horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the usual form: but somewhat more narrow, and deep than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had been found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short; but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rear, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, under shelter whereof the disorderd troops might rally themselves. Thus much it seems, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battels accordingly, as meaning to show more skill, than was in his understanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horse; against which this manner of imballing was very unprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Emilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wife men yield for very wantiness unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horsemen, under the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Italians: Cn. Scervilius the former years Consul, had the leading of the battle. The Sun was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, between the Roman Velites, and Hannibal's Darters and Slingers of the Baleares; Asdrubal brake upon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of service on horse-back, used in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and break thorow. Wherefore they not only used their Lances and Swords; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies; grasped one another: and so their horses running from under them, fell many to the ground, where starting up again, they began to deal blows like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were over-born, and driven by plain force to a staggering recoil. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gauls and Spaniards, were not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, unequal both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battle work enough, and somewhat more than enough, to break that great Crescent, upon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battle drew towards the midst; by whose aid, these opposites were forced to disband, and fly back to their first place. This they did in great haste and fear: and were with no less haste, and folly pursued. Upon the Africans that stood behind them, they needed not to fall foul; both for that there was void room enough; and for as much as the Rear, or Horns of this Moon, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-encounter them, when time should require. In this hasty retreat, or flight of the Gauls and Spaniards, it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limb or utter compass of the half Moon, made the innermost or concave surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inside outward: the horns or points thereof, as yet, untouched, only turning round, and recovering very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an half circle; which they should not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thick and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming unable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot been cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on upon those that stood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principal strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side advanced to far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they encircled them, in a manner, behind: and forward they could not pass far, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least ease. Herby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undisturbed, until now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themselves, as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulk of their Army, into the throat of slaughter; had they seen those weapons bent against them at the first, when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashness of inferior Capains: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in war, being vanquished in horse, had put himself among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that he and they did willfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, having broken the Troops of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed them along the River side, beating down and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himself was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did cast himself among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this expectation. Nevertheless he cheered up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own stout behaviour: bearing down and killing many of the enemies with his own hand. The line did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battle; and with better success. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a Troop of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to save him from further harm; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakness, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Consul had given order to do as in many battles, the Roman men at arms had left their horses, to help their foot in distress. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and understood that the Consul had willed his horsemen to dismount: He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather be would have dejection among me, bound hand and foot: meaning that he had them now almost as late, as if they were bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of his associates, in the left wing, was marvellously troubled by Hanno (or Madorbal), and the Numidians: who bearing up and down about that great sandy Plain, raised a loud dust; which a strong South wind, blowing there accidentally, drove into the eyes and mouths of the Romans. These, using their advantage both of number and of lightness, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and whirling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him a happy day of it. For when the battles were even ready to join; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behind their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and throwing down their arms, rendered themselves. This was good luck to begin withal, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leisure to examine them; but caused them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty adventurers did as he bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Under policy, for which they had thus yielded, besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field of such as were slain, and therewithal flew upon the hindmost of the Romans, whilst all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terror. Thus Hannibal, in a plain level ground, found means to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was given by the same hand which gave the first. Asdrubal (having in short space broken the Roman Troops of horse, and cut in pieces all, save the Company of Æmilius that rushed into the grove of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, between the River and their own Battalions) did not stay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joined, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearful Cloud, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismal storm unto those upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more work toward, than they could hope to sustain; thought it the best way, to avoid the danger by present flight. The Consul was no less wise than they, in apprehending the greatness of his own peril: nor more desperate, in striving to work impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many thrank from him, to sustain the impression alone, which he could not have induced with their assistance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serve him to consider. Close at the heels of him and his flying Troops, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal unto the pursuit, as fittest for that service. Asdrubal himself, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily; who before had little resistance, being inclosed, and laid at on every side, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pitiful slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whither or which way, whilst every one sought to avoid those enemies, whom he saw nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got up to horse, and saved themselves: which though it is hardly understood how they could do; yet I will rather believe, than suppose that Livie to reporteth, to grace thereby his History with this following Tale: Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he saw the Consul fighting all bloodied upon a stone, intrusted him to rise and save himself; offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to fight for himself, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought again into judgment by the People, either as an accuser of his colleague, or as guilty himself of that day's loss. Forther, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to forsake Rome, as fast as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he loved and died mindful of his whole family's conflict. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul uttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawn to that battle, or when he beheld the first defeat of his horse; at what time he put himself in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his Troop, in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grofs of the Romans, was inclosed indeed as within a calf; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed up the mouth: in which part, they first of all were thrust together, and began the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not fit his horse, whilst the battle yet lasted, and whilst the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himself, was now (had he never so well been mounted) unable to fly, having in his way to close a throng of his own mile rable followers, and so many heaps of bodies, as fell after the day that great Carnage. It fullness unto his honour, that in the Battle he fought no less valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himself, and dissuaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly lost, it had been in his power to save his own life unto the good of his Country, never more needing it, I should think, that he either too much disesteemed himself; or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankful Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English verse of the Lord John Talbot, Viscount Lisle, son to that famous Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battle of Coswallon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grievously, if not mortally wounded, and accountable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flower of his youth, unhurt, easily able to have escaped, and not answerable for that day's misfortune, when he refused to forsake his Father, who foretelling the loss of the battle, and not meaning to stain his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble son to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, save two or three thousand, who (as Livie faith) escaped into the lesser Camp; whence the same night, about six hundred of them brake forth, and joining with such of those in the greater Camp, as were willing to try their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about four thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troops, partly dispersed into Cannulum: the next day the Roman Camps, both less and greater, were yielded Unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polibius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Ausidus (as was thence before) to set upon the Camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-near done, the battle was lost: and Hannibal, coming over the water to them, drove them into their own Camp, which they quickly yielded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did fly, and thereby escaped, whilst their fellows, making defence in vain, retired into their Camp, and held the enemy buffed. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Cannae, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behind the River; and Terentius the Consul recovered Pensula, with threecore and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvel, for Pensula lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his nearest way thither, had been through the midst of Hannibal's Army, if the passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned up some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took other ways, and were scattered over the fields, 2000 or there about, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slain, all save 300, who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battle of Cannae, besides L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quætors or Treasurers, and 21 Colonels or Tribunes of the Soldiers, 80 Senators, or such as had born office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of special mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last years Consul, and Miminius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battle, Livie makes no greater than 3000 foot, and 300 horse; too few to have defended for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps, which yet the same Livie faith, to have been over-completely yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than 8000. It may therefore be, that these 3000 were only such as the Enemy spared, when the jury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about 5000 more, who yielded in the greater Camp, when their company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host, nothing to chargeable, as now they find it. On the side of Hannibal there died some 4000 Gauls, 1500 Spaniards and Africans, and 2000 Horse, at thereabouts: a loss not sensible, in the joy of to great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Mahabari advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the war had presently been at an end. But he believed not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to lose a victory.

SECT. IX.

Of things following the Battle at Cannae.

Not without good cause doth Polibius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian; who, regarding more the pleasure of them unto whose honour they consecrated their travels, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites and Fathers conspire. No man of sound judgement will condemn this liberty of censure, which Polibius hath used. For, to recompense his juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantial arguments, to justify his own Relation; and confute the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either of these two Cities, but have spared some part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think or there about, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slain, all save 300, who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this five circumfpection is needful at the prefent : fuch is the treperanguity, or forgetfulnefs, which we find in the brief narration of things, following the Batel of Canne. For it is faid, that four thoufand foot and horfe gathered together about the Conful Terentius at Venuſia, that others to the number of ten thoufand got into Cannifum, chufing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conful Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto thoſe of Scipio at Cannifum, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well near ten thoufand men about him; that thefe letters of the Conful were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had been taking order for pacifying thoſe tumults in the City, which grew upon the firſt ruiſe of the overthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadors from Capua (after ſome conſultation, where he it were meet to fend any, or without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent unto Terentius, and found him at Venuſia, a pretty while before he wrote thoſe letters, which overlook (in a manner) at Rome the firſt news of the overthrow. Among ſuch incoherence, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath no more particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no real argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman Camp, and trufled up the ſpoils, forthwith he diſlodged, and marched away unto Cannium; finding a diſpoſition in the Hipſines, and many other people thereabout, to forſake the Roman party, and make alliance with Carthage. The firſt Town that opened the gates unto him, was Cafſa, where he laid up his baggage; and leaving his Brother Magus to take in other places, he haſted into Campania. The general affection of the multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclining unto him; not only in regard of their grievous loſſes ſuſtained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themſelves, who could not hinder him from ſpoiling the Country, eſpecially the poorer fort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving reſpect unto that great courage (as it ſeemed) which he uſed unto ſuch of them as became his priſoners. For as at other times, ſo now after this great victory at Cannus, he had lovingly diſmiſſed as many of the Italian Conſederates of Rome, as fell into his hands; reluking them gently for being ſo obſtinate againſt him that had fought to deliver them from bondage. Neither ſpared he to win their love by gifts, pretending to admire their valour; but ſeeking indeed, by all ways and means, to make them his, whilſt all other motives were concurrent. At this time alſo he began to deal kindly (though againſt his nature) with the Roman priſoners; telling them that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Eſtate; but being provoked by injuries, fought to right himſelf and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of theſe two Cities, Rome or Carthage, ſhould bear ſovereign Rule, not which of them ſhould be deſtroyed. So he gave them leave to chuſe ſuch of their number, that ſhould be ſent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranſome: and together with theſe he ſent Carthago a Nobleman of Carthage, and General of his Horſe, to ſee the diſpoſition of the Senate, whether it were bowed as yet by ſo much adverſity, and could ſtoop unto deſire of peace. But with the Romans theſe Arts prevailed not, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or moſt of them, ſave the Roman Colonies, or the Latinæ, were not only weary of their loſſes paſt, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucanes, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not until the former Generation utterly ſubdued, began to re-ſuſcite their wonted ſpirits: but the Campanians, a Nation of all in Italy moſt bound unto the Senate of Rome, and by many mutual affinities therewith as ſtraightly conjoined, as were any ſave the Latinæ, changed on a ſudden their love into hatred, without any other cauſe found, than change of fortune.

Campania is the moſt goodly and fruitful Province of Italy, if not (as ſome then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, anſwerable unto the Country, whereof it was Head; ſo great, ſo fair, and wealthy, that it ſeemed no leſs convenient a feat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, Bravery is the laſt requiſite unto ſovereign command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themſelves like Jayes by their feathers, deſpised the unfortunate virtue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there ſome of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore eſpecial regard unto the Maſtity of Rome, and could not indure to hear of Innovation. But the Clitavian faction had lately prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleaſure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whoſe credit grew, and was upheld by furthering all popular deſires; whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the leaſt. Some of the Capuans had offered their City to the Carthaginians ſhortly after the battel of Thyrſacene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania: the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the narrowſs of the Roman Army, or ſome other fear of the Capuans hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leiſure to treat about any article of new Conſederacy: or, had leiſure ſerved, yet were the multitude (whoſe inconstant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle uſage, and free diſmiſſing of ſome priſoners in good account among them) unable to hold any ſuch negotiation, without advice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promiſed to yield up their Town to Hannibal, and meet him on the way, with ſome of their Nobility that ſhould aſſure him of all faithful meanings, were driven to fit ſtill in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet ſufficiently diſcovered themſelves to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens; who thereupon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate, on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their own cowardice. The people holding ſo tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawfull government of Magiſtrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppreſſion; had now good cauſe to fear left the Senators would become the Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans bring them under a more ſtraight ſubjection, than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into ſome outrage, Pacuvius made uſe of to ſerve his own ambition. He diſcouraged unto the Senate, as they ſate in Council, about thoſe motions troubling the City: and ſaid, That he himſelf had both married a Roman Lady, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman boy; but, that the danger of forſaking of the Roman party was not now the greateſt: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to joyne themſelves with Hannibal, who ſhould conſentance the fact, and ſave them harmleſs. This he ſpoke as a man well known to be beloved himſelf by the people, and privy unto their deſigns. Having thoroughly terrified the Senate, by ſaying open the danger hanging over them: he promiſed nevertheless to deliver them all, and to let things in quiet, if they would freely put themſelves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting up the Court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter, nor iſſue forth, without his leave: he called the people to aſſembly: and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them, that theſe wicked Governors were ſurprized by his policy, and all faſt, ready to abide what ſentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he adviſed them, as a thing which neceſſity required, That they ſhould chuſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger upon the old. Sorehearing unto them the names of one or two Senators; he asked what the judgement was of thoſe. All cryed out. That they were worthy of death. Chuſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for ſuch an election, was ſilent, until at laſt ſome one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were utterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for more known fault, baſeneſs and inſufficiency; or elfe even becauſe they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whilſt more were to be choſen; (the ſtuffe man to be ſubſtituted, having been named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and eaſily prevailed with the people, that the preſent Senate might for this time be ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter, which (doublets) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelves indebted, for ſaving all their lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this by all obſequiouſneſs, to court the people, giving the reins unto their lawleſs Will, who elfe were likely to caſt them down. All the City being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battel at Canne, this impediment was removed; and ſew there were that would open their mouths to ſpeak againſt the rebellion. Yet forſmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then ſerve the Romans in the Iſle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe prevailed ſo far, that Embaſſadors were ſent unto Terentius the Conful, to ſee his preſent caſe, and what he could miniſter of Hope unto them. Theſe, whereſoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in ſpirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſervice of their State, and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented unto them the greiveneſs of the Romans miſfortune: ſaying, That all was loſt; and that the Campanians muſt now not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themſelves, but make war in their defence againſt the Carthaginians; as the Romans had ſometimes done for the Campanians againſt the Samnites. Hereunto he is ſaid to have added a fooliſh invective againſt Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, how he had taught them to make bridges of ſlaughtered carcafes, and to feed upon mans fleſh, with ſuch other ſtuff, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campanians themſelves, he put them in mind of their preſent ſtrength: having thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, with money, and all provisions, in abundance. This he diſmiſſed them prouder than they came; and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordſhip; whereas before they were ſomewhat timorous in adventuring to ſeck their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua: the ſame Embaſſadors were diſpatched away to Hannibal, with whom they eaſily made alliance, upon theſe conditions, that the Campanians ſhould be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Laws; That no Citizens of theſe ſhould be ſubject unto any Carthaginian Magiſtrate, in what caſe ſoever, whether in War or Peace; and that three hundred Roman priſoners, ſuch as themſelves would chuſe, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Againſt all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, oppoſed himſelf earneſtly; uſing, in vain, many perſwaſions, to the willful and head-ſtrong Multitude; whom he put in mind of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wiſhing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were ſending Embaſſadors to Hannibal; and this alſo did he, when the new alliance was concluded; but moſt earneſtly, when a Carthaginian Garriſon was entering the Town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by ſuch a notable piece of ſervice, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forſaken.

Advertiſement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not far off, ſent for Magius to come ſpeak with him in the Camp. This Magius reſuſed: alleging, that he was by the late concluded Articles, free from ſubjection unto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon haſted himſelf towards Capua; forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples, which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalatus, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided to lay ſiege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great ſolemnity and pomp: all the people iſſuing forth of the Town, to behold the great Commander, which had won ſo many noble victories. Having taken his pleaſure in the ſight of that goodly City, and paſſed over his firſt entertainments, he came into their Senate, where he commended their reſolution, in ſhaking off the Roman yoke; promiſing, that ere long all Italy and Rome it ſelf, ſhould be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies, he prayed them, that they would not uſe him as a Campanian, but a Traitor to the State, and uſe him accordingly, giving ſentence out of hand upon him, as he deſerved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his firſt coming, by putting to great a man to death, yet fearing that they might fuſe for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it beſt to ſend him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal ſettled his friendſhip with the Campanians: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to ſpeak againſt him; being ſifted by Perolla the Son of Pacuvius, whilſt he was at ſupper, the firſt night of his coming, had not his Fathers authority kept him from accompanying any ſuch attempt. All the Town (beſides) were were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or (which is all one) to have innocthered them to death in an hot Bath.

The fame course of fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other Towns thereabouts which depended on this, as their Mother City, Nola, Neapolis, Capri, Castellum, and Acerra, where the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to find them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in cale, to put Garrisons into all their walled Towns, but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants. Rome it self was in extreme fear of Hannibal coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Canna; and the grief of that loss was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loss already received, or the fear of destruction presently to come, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stifle the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Couriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, buried alive two men and women, Gauls and Greeks, in their Ox-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions, we may justly think that Sibyl herself was instructed by the Devil; yet is not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked South-fayers; whose detestable calumnies they afterwards for their own honour (as abashed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollon; and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacify the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor of Ostacium; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africa. In these were contained news of one Carthago, a fleet that waited the Kingdom of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles of Sicily, which was in readiness to set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take sovereign charge of the Weal-publick, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despised of the Weal-publick. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the general reputation. If this coming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outrages of the people; what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength.

This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Lucius Liv. 1. 26. would have us think, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I believe him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to follow their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cæ. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator, and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised four new Legions, and one thousand horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very boys. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for the custody of the City. So it may be Liv. 23. that these two Legions being drawn into the field; four new ones of Prætorians, or Striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manifold service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arm these Companies, they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoils of their enemies that had been there set up; among which were goodly Armour of the Gauls, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were fain to suffice forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was that Carthago with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthago was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor kinsfolk but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their fault; which yet they obtained not. Besides the general custom of the Romans held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken prisoner in the former War; not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy, much was alleged against those who now craved ransom: but the special point was, that they were willingly lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others do. It is sufficient not unto these poor men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to avoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the war, are said to have cost more, than the sum of them amounted unto, that would have ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance tenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been severe; when as indeed they were fain to be present fortune, poor and somewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proof, that Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ransom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereas he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we lightly consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchised) until the war should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, seeing he dealt only for ready money, they chose rather to say, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like austerity, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great battel. These were charged for having fled: as the prisoners were for not flying, when they might have done so. True it is, that in such cases (if ever) that which they call Ragione del Stato, may serve for an excuse: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miserable exigent, is fain to help it self, by doing injuries to the private.

As to deal the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serve, not as others did, until they had fulfilled twenty years in the War, or else were fifty years of age, but until this War should be ended, how longsoever it lasted, and that without reward. The same strict censure was afterwards laid upon others, for their misbehaviour: but never upon any man of quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other brain'd fools his companions; who, being frightened out of their wits, with the terror of so great a loss, were desirous, after the usual way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce grown shortly distasteful to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheless it was quickly digested, the excuse being Liv. 24. no less apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needful business within the City, took the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weakest estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofizia, with a Fleet ready to set sail for Sicily, having one Legion aboard his ships, and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Island, and do what harm he could in Africa. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, he sent these of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannus: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence he was called by the Magistrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanians) to let in the Carthaginians; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by leaning to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: affaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of dissuality: had also a sure Haven, where, by its flood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Country. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, that Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and such talk used some, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratify the Carthaginians. Of these, one L. Banius was chief, a stout young Gentleman, and Souldier of especial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Canna; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greatest thanks perceiving this, wrought upon the same false nature of the Gentleman; and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly reputed for his personal valour, he made this Banius so far in love with him, that no thing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by composition; and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly beset, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished often with Marcellus; not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make show of a meaning to take the Town; which he sought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed much league between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, whereby it was concluded, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. In the night time there passed much league between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby were so earnest in the love of their new Society, that they are said to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the present they could lay hand; or (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other Towns thereabout which depended on this, as their Mother City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Castellum, and Aversa, where the Cities next adjoining, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to find them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Towns, but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants. Rome it self was in extrem fear of Hannibal coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Canna: and the grief of that loss was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loss already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stifle the noise and lamentations, whereas the streets were full. Couriers were sent farth, to bring afflicted tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varrus had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, buried alive two men and women, Gauls and Greeks, in their Oxe-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions, we may justly think that Sibyl herself was instructed by the Devil. Yet it is not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked South-fayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassadour was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollo, and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacify the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor of Ostacium; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africa. In these were contained news of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the Kingdom of Hieron their good friend and confederate, and of another fleet, riding among the Isles Ægæis, which was in readiness to set upon Lilybeum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take sovereign charge of the Wealth-public, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Wealth-public. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the general reputation. If this coming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks, they notified abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength.

This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Livy 1. 28. would have us think, that it was done generally, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I believe him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to fiew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator, and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Soldiers, of whom they raised four new Legions, and one thousand horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very boys. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for the custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field, four new ones of Prætorians, or triplings were left in their places. In such raw Soldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manual service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt or punishment, if he would serve in the War. To arm these Companies, they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the spoils of their enemies that had been there let up: among which, were 6000 Armours of the Gauls, that had been carried in the Triumph of G. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward for their insolent oppressions, that they were fain to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was that Carthago with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthago was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilst he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition to be ransomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor kinsfolk but the great need, wherein the City then stood, of able Soldiers, commending their suit; which yet they obtained not. Besides the general custom of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken prisoner in the former War) not to be too tender of such as had yielded to the enemy, much was alleged against those who now craved ransom: but the special point was, that they were willingly lost, since they might have saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not unto those poor men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls; that they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuses; whereby to avoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither must we regard it, that the slaves which were armed for the war, are said to have cost more, than the sum of money amounting, that would have ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, devised to countenance renance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been severe; when as indeed they were fuitable to the present fortune, poor and somewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proof, that Hannibal valued those Roman slaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Masters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Soldiers ransom: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, which he thought them current. But if we should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for slaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet must we wishal consider, that these private men did only lend these slaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them

(when by order of the Senate they were enfranchised) until the war should be ended. If Hannibal would have given such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, seeing he dealt only for ready money, they chose rather so say, We will not give, than we cannot. The like austerity, upon the same reason, but contrary pretence, was used toward the Soldiers that escaped from that great battle. These were charged for having fled: as the prisoners were for not flying, when they might have done so. True it is, that in such cases (if ever Jeha which they call Ragione del Stato, may serve for an excuse: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miserable exigent, is fain to help it self, by doing injuries to private men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had served at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serve, not as others did, until they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or else were fifty years of age, but until this War should be ended, how long soever it lasted, and that without reward. The same strict censure was afterwards laid upon others, for their misbehaviour: but never upon any man of quality, save only (a good while after this, at better leisure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hard-brained fools his companions; who, being frightened out of their wits, with the terror of so great a loss, were devoting, after the usual way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had scarce one Town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew shortly distasteful to the Commonality: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheless it was quickly digested, the excuse being that it was less apparent than the fault. M. Junius the Dictator, having dispatched all needful business within the City, took the field with five and twenty thousand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done by Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ofis, with a Fleet ready to set sail for Sicily, having one Legion aboard his ships; and fifteen hundred other Soldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Island, and do what harm he could in Africa. But hearing of the overthrow at Canna, he sent these of his new Levy to Rome, for defence toward Canusium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Soldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seceding to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived in seven time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many like wise Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: allaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with any least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven, whereby it stood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoil of the Lands and Villages abroad the Country. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and such talk used some, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Banius was chief, a stout young Gentleman, and Soldier of especial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal had dead at Canna; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greatest thanks perceiving this, wrought upon the same false nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who so desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly repaid for his personal valour, he made this Banius go far in love with him, that no thing could be attempted not presently advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and allayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans; but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by composition, and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Prætor, yet if they saw Marcellus hardly beset, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it might be, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make show of a meaning to force the Town; which he sought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messengers between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was forced, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town should presently rise; and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing lest the Carthaginians would shortly adventure, even to find him buffed within the City, whilst the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way to cut off the Enemies hope, and send him away before them. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three several gales, looking towards the enemy: he gave a straight command, that all the Citizens should keep their houses. That he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder, against whom he had customarily ifted forth before more early, every day to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now buffed with the Citizens. Whereupon he had his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing less, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherewith Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Soldiers, broke forth upon them, with a great noise, to make his unexpected fall the more terrible. Whilst the Carthaginians, much out of order, were come of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gales opened, wherewith in like sort issued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The sudden terror was more available unto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the bravest Acts performed in all that War, forasmuch as hereby it was first proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus being freed from his enemies that were departed, took a first account of the Citizens of Nola, condemning above three score and ten of high Treason, whose heads he struck off; and leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the mean season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded; he thought it no wisdom to loiter in persuasions, but laid siege unto it, and began on all sides to close it up. This terrified the People, who knew themselves unable to hold out. Therefore before his Works were finished, and they quite surrounded, they stole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing news of the Dictator, that he was about Cap sine, thither went Hannibal, as being unwilling that an enemy so near should disquiet him at Capua, where he meant to Winter. It seems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginians: who durst with a small part of his Army seek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon to fight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slain in plain battle, but by a sudden eruption; winneth chiefly, in what great fear they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that having three years since demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleasure, by his own Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good news, to hear, That in a skirmish not far from Rome, he appeared to be a man, and not refitless. At Cap sine the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Præfines there were, and about four hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latins. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battle at Cerna, being sent by their several States to the Camp: whither whilst they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountered them, and sent them back forrowful, for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whose government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another to Cap sine, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard news from Capua. How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Cap sine were effected as they of Capua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Præfines and their fellows; but the Soldiers were too hard for them, and after many trains laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Western part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Cap sine were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place winneth, upon what honest reasons they furnished it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more work than he expected. Divers assaults he gave, but was still repelled with loss: and many sallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driven to close them up, and seek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the Horse, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who fain would have relieved Cap sine, but that the Dictator being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had given him an express charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the over-flowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his journey, such intreaties were needless. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Cap sine. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrels of Corn were sent by night, floating down the River; and when some of these, being carried away by an Eddie of water, stuck among the Willows on the bank, whereby this manner of relief was discovered and prevented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the stream, which faintly sustained the poor besieged men. At length when all food was spent, and whatsoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallies, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; whereupon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seed. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience, and said, That he meant not to stay at Cap sine until the Rape were grown. Wherefore though hitherto he had refused to hearken unto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others; by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ransom; which when they had paid, he quietly dimissed them, according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Cap sine, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he restored it. To the Præfines Soldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their virtue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were in Præfines: which

which is no weak proof, of the good estate wherewith the Cities flourished, that were subject to the Roman Government. This siege of Cap sine was not a little beneficial to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise have been better spent. For winter overtook him long before he could dispatch the business; which was to quit with his honor he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though effeminate as it was, He therewithal did often beat the Romans in following times, as shall appear hereafter.

SECT. X.

Of the great Supply that was decreed at Carthage, to be sent to Hannibal into Italy. How by the malice of Hanno and Stobor perfunctory of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Romans Historians, how partial they were in their writings.

When Mago, the son of Amilcar had spent some time about the taking in such Italian, as fell from the Romans after the battle at Cerna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyful message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chafed, wounded or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former war never shunned any occasion of fight, were now grown so calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he never durst adventure to come to battle; That not without reason their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them above 200000. and taken above fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that followed the fortune of those great victories, and revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief feat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had been entertained, where he meant to rest that winter attending their supply. As for the war, He said it was even at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themselves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the war was far from home, in the Enemies Country: that so many battles had much diminished his brothers Army: that the Soldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, Corn, and other necessities; but that these things must be sent from Carthage; which the victory would require with large amends. Finally, he called the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatness of the Roman calamity, forasmuch as none but the * principal of that order, were accustomed to. Thus Livy reports Hannibal's credulity is, that while Rome was poor, the bravery of private men was not altogether so great, as the Law would have permitted, though otherwise his Amicitia. The wearing of the Ring, was the general privilege of the Roman Equites.

Who fo considers the former Punic War, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the duration thereof, any such hopeful advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcom. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perfwader unto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for their good success. Hereunto he made no answer, but likely that Hanno made the same formal answer, which Livius puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres Conscripti, by a term proper to the Romans; and putting them in mind of his own shameful overthrow received at the Islands Agates: yet the sum of his speech appears to have been no less malicious than is set down, forasmuch as Hannibal himself, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchinians, had oppressed their Family, when otherwise it could not, with the ruin of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jeit of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill befitted him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more help as if he had been beaten, or that he had taken their Camp, filled forthwith with spoil, to make request for meat and money. To these cavils, if answer were needful, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Camp: the best of the Soldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few silver studs in the bridles, and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any main convey of money and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to have done, when they won the Camp of Ad-drahal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might such an objection more justly have been made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to prevail, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seek peace, whilst they had so much the better in war.

What would have been the issue of this counsel, if it had been followed, it were not easy to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have been kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shameful overthrows; since after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruin, longer, than until such time as Rome was at leisure from all other wars. This counsel therefore of Hanno, though it might seem temperate, was indeed very pestilent, and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a main consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should be sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, should be levied in Spain; not only to supply, as need should require, the Armies in their Province, but to be transported into Italy.

This great Aid, had it been as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to tax the reticels impudence of Hannibal, in forsaking to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in relieving his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finished the business, with less dangerous adventure, and the pleasures, which he men enjoyed among the Campanians, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that wereto be employed in the following War. But either the too much carelessness of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the craty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than sense of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been so well set down. The * Elephants were sent: and some money adventure, uncertain it is how long after. But those great forces of threecore thousand foot, and four thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of war. Only some small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain: and the journey of Asdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by the Tributes received from their Subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the War of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace: after the loss of Agathis. Yet we see, what great Armes of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans on the other side, having three or four years before been forced to some extraordinary cost, are fain to go upon credit; even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arm for their defence. Such advantage in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrrus their Mother-City in the bottom of the Straights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When the time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it self, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman fallshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of Faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousy was bred, that this mighty City would again rebel. For the Car- thaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform whatsoever should be enjoined them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yielded up all their weapons, and engines of War: the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withal, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) This Trade of Merchandize, by which ye now live, is not fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry, an wholesome kind of life, and ending men with many laudable qualities which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though suggered with glowing words, plainly shews, what good observations the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added fill to this conclusion, Thus I think, that Carthage should be destroyed. He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height wherunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilful than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or most of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) even the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the war strongly) was ver-¹ past, go more leisurely to work, than had been requisite, in the execution. It was as if for Hanno to perfwade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy; to going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the enemies, or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could do so) finished the war, might easily make * Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own slackness, incredulity, dullness, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perfwaded rather to make small disbursements in Spain, than to set up all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible to hold a Country of so large extent, and to open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affliction of the Naturals being (as in a new conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had been, to make a running War, by which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garisons or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their main intent against Rome it self, until such time as every little thorn were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporia have been besieged and forced: which, by reason of alliance with with the Majilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the Town of Emporia, was too strong to be won in battle: it had long defended it self against the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceeding well fortified: a great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compass, very strong likewise, and friend unto the Gracians, though not over-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Town of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Majilians, Romans and some Spaniards, would have been a work of little less difficulty, than was the Roman war (in appearance) after the battle at Canna: yea, it had been ineffect none other, than to alter the fear of the war; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, near unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it to be forborn, a great folly it was to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making for war upon their City. For even so the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeavoured to change the fear of the war transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is necessary to their own purposes, did make them easily win at opportunity, and hope that somewhat would fall out well of it self, though they set not to their helping hands, Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken unto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keep the people full. In the mean while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselves in travel for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had been somewhat more than needful. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far less honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their subject Provinces, but in administration of their own estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Wealth above their private interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimony used toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this war present, will make them complain, with feeling sighs, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Canna; when gladly they would give all their Treasures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let pass, as if it were cost enough to fend a few handfulls into Spain.

That both the Spanish business, and the state of Africk it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, upon success of things in Italy, the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governments, it is very hard and almost impossible to tell down. For, though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Livy, the tender love of his own Country, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others; yet must we not, for his sake believe those lies, which the unpartial judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them original. It were needless to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untutth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He faith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having clean spent their strength, and being even broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set down by A. milius Probus; That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any war. These words, being referred to the brave resolution of the Carthaginian soldiers, and the singular virtue of the General, insinuating such spirit into them, may be taken as not over liberal. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman fleet of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their arms and forsake Sicily, threatening, that otherwise he would not talk of any composition: Amilcar boldly made him chuse, whether he would talk of it or no; for that the Arms which his Country had put into his hands to use against her enemies, it was not his purpose to yield up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custom upon like advantages, were contented to let Amilcar have his will, and not to stand with him upon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were far from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth; saying, That howsoever Amilcar and his Soldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tyred, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman story) and those that had more regard of truth, in the narration of the mighty City of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livy introduced Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shameful overthrow at the Islands * Agathis, with the great services of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet † elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That affairs of Carthage were never better, than little before the loss of their Fleet in that battle at Sea; wherein himself was General. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipios in this war, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with P. Scipio, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livy to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their relations; which are such as follow.

SECT. XI.

Strange reports of the Romans victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar followed thence his Brother Hannibal into Italy.

It hath been shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul returning from Gaul into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alps, fell before him his Brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with 14000. foot of the Confederates, and 1200. horse, had been allotted unto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal; who, since he was marching into Italy with with

with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio believed, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made hold to carry some of the number back with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himself remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship; which being expired, he was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of 8000. men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain against the Carthaginians; whom they vanquished in so many battles, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we have cause to wonder how the enemy could so often find means to repair his forces, and return strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win unto their Concoyde, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and must adventure to break it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serve to arm the Natives against these Invaders, and to reclaim those that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill Effects, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure; which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant (but in that Age) poor, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in the Italian Wars; or serving the Carthaginians in Africa. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipios were neither so many, nor so great as they are let out by Livius. This we may be bold to say, that the great Captain Fabius, or Livie in his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth answer. That if Adrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Adrubal, being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battle, gave only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his money, Elephants and broken Troops, over Tages, directly towards the Pyrenees, and to toward Italy, upon which he fell with more than three thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most inconvenient for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that these Elephants being so few before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to have done in the last battle between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us; unto whom it was no wisdom to give too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipios in Spain, not greatly insinuating particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven Town, not far within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the flame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the story begins to hint, I could easily believe, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and having no jurisdiction in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself into the love of the Barbarians, among whom his dexterity in practice had the better success, for that he seemed to have none other errand than freeing them at liberty. This pretext availed with some; others were to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yield by force or fear; especially when he had won a battle against Hanno. Into all Treaties of Accord, made with these people, likely it is, that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgot, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Majestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conservent, which is, as Tully interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome; yet implicitly denied an oblique covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, that the Spaniards became ditissimi Romanæ, of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience, particularly in the Burgundians; Hannibal had found at his coming among them such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them flart from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governor over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord, that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heirs) he made him not only Lieutenant-General over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferior Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoice at the coming of Scipio, with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joy, in seeing the custom of all conquered Nations in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indirectly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanovs, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as some sensible still of the present evil which they felt, than regardless of the greater mischief, whereto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affliction of this Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which, it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battle with Scipio, wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stisnum, a Town hard by, and won it. But Adrubal, having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far from Tarracon, whom he found careless, as after a victory, roving abroad in the Country; and with great slaughter drave them aboard their ships.

ships. This done, he ran up into the Country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aid his Fleet; where having set things in order, he returned back, and made towards Adrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanasia their chief City, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Asturan likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town; which they defended thirty days hoping in vain, that the sharp Winter and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were fain at length to yield; and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to help their distressed neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause contented, become Carthaginians on the sudden, in the next news that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditissimi Romanæ, subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold war against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Adrubal, as it were by a charm, stirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Arms in his quarrel; whilst himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Publius perhaps or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Country, was beaten by Adrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stir until Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deep Snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably think, that they fought their own benefit; helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyrannies, under which they were to be brought by these new Masters, hearkening again unto the comfortable promises of those that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Country Laws, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testify: even from henceforth unto the times of Augustus Caesar, till when they were never thoroughly conquered.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships that ran not too far on ground, he took; and thereby grew Master of the whole Coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty states in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages; whereby Adrubal was compelled to fly into the uttermost corners of the Land, and hide himself in Lusitania. Yet it follows, that the Ilergetes did again rebel; that Ad- drubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him Hostages. These took from the Carthaginians three Towns, and vanquished him in two battles; wherein they slew fifteen thousand of his men, and took four thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two Brethren jointly administered the business in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian War, the two Scipios did send envoies, without both fear or doubt, past over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many other, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Adrubal. Bostor, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be persuaded by one Acdex a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the Country, was by freely restoring unto them their Hostages, as resting without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman General; persuaded them, as he had done Roman officers, to make the Liberty their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much love, if the tale were true, and it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we find that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing for many particulars, whereof I can believe so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selves with these.

The year following was like unto this: Adrubal must be beaten again. The two Scipios divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Adrubal; with much labour and cruelty, hath gotten four thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Africa: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Masters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans, because they had been chidden the last year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetanians, or Carpetani, an Inland people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. These do much mischief, so that Adrubal is fain to make a journey to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making a head, do valiantly assail him, that they drive him for very fear, to encamp himself strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battle. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Country round about. This good success breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Adrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, tears them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yieldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Adrubal should lead his Army forth into Italy; which we may wonder why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his letters in what bad case he was; and had he weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported; and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almost all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Adrubal therefore presently sends word to Carthage, That this must not be so; or, if they will needs have it it fo, that then they must lend him a successor, and threefolded a strong Army, which to employ they should find work more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuse; Adrubal must needs be gone: Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that service, both by Land and Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Adrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himself with store of money, that he might have wherewithal to win the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must pass, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembering to ease him of his care. But since it can be no better, he lays great impositions upon all the Spaniards his subjects; and having gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. Scipio's hearing these news, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Rivers name running by it) the richest Town in all those quarters, that was confederate with Adrubal; who thereupon steps aside to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battle with him; which they win the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be hailed into Italy. Great numbers are slain; and few should have escaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battles were fully joined. Their Camp the Romans take and spoil; where by (questionless) they are marvellously enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spain being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This days event joins all Spain to the Romans; if any part of the Country stood in doubt before; and puts Adrubal so far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him small hope of keeping himself safe in Spain. Of these exploits advertisement is sent to Rome, and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, That they have neither money, apparel, nor bread, wherewith to sustain their Army and Fleet; that all is wanting: so as unless they may be supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an evil season; the State being scarcely able, after the loss at Canna, to help it self at home. Yet relief is sent; how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere into the relation of things, whereof the truth is less questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipios pursue Adrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking-holes. What else can we think, that remember the late news of him, and how fearfully he misruled his own safety? They find him, and Agas and Amilcar the Son of Bomilcar, with an Army of three-score thousand men, besieging Iliturgi; (which the learned Ortelius, and others probably conjecture to have stood, where Carrinensa is now in the Kingdom of Aragon; for there was Iliturgi, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Ilurgenses their nearest Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The Town is greatly distressed, but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible laughter of all that resisted them: and having victualled the place, encourage Townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against three-score thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and took that day, besides prisoners and other booty, fifty and eight ensigns.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Iliturgi, fall upon Incibilis, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by war, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondered, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Adrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his own; and being beaten in his Journey, had lost his wealthy carriages when his Camp was taken after the battle by Iberus. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are beaten again at Incibilis; where there were of them above thirteen thousand slain, and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius, Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Levy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one Year, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Adrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrom Altum, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio encampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Country round about it is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought best, to retire unto some place more assured. So Publius withdraws himself unto Mons vitioria: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibilis, overlooketh the Southern Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Adrubal the son of Gefso, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himself to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, until his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great City of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being far distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Batis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians pass over Iberus, to besiege Iliturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the year before. But thither they go: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them them the next day, and in two battels kills above 12000, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with fix and thirty Ensigns. This victory (doublets) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda, where the Romans are loon at their heels. There is a great battle fought, that lasted four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable victory: and a more notable would they have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirteen and nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and sixteen and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians fly to Auringer, and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquished the Carthaginians again; but kills not half so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these overthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to let war on foot, quickly fly to the broken troops of Adrubal, who having also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again; and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensigns, and other apparences. After to many victories, the Romans are even ashamed to leave Saguntum embarralled unto the Carthaginians; since, in behalf of that City, they had at first entered into this war. And well may we think it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Country once and again. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were slain (as appears) to go their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for having to long forbore to do that which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the present they won Saguntum; and restored the possession thereof unto such of the poor dispersed Citizens as they can find out. They also waste and destroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had misruled unto Hannibal matter of quarrel against the Saguntines. This last action (questionless) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would have disturbed them if they had been able.

But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Adrubal's journey; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporia, an Haven Town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phoenicians, kin to the Maspians, friends to the Romans. They have easily won their party, lost, recovered, and lost again, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by periwallow, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their own unsettled passions, and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by surprize; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we find no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we think, that all those battels lately remembered, after every one of which Adrubal fate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebel, were prosperous unto the Carthaginians. For is it not the custom of Armies vanquished, to carry to war from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their own places of strength, and therein to attend the levy and arrival of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have consumed a whole year following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little less than two years business. Of these Celtiberians we heard before, that they had yielded up themselves unto the Romans; for security of their faith, given Hostages to Scipio; and, in his appointment, made war against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and not without express condition of a great sum, hired to serve in the Roman Camp. How this may hold together, I cannot perceive; unless perhaps in those days it were the Roman custom, or rather the custom of some bad Author whom Levy follows, so call every messenger, or frailer, that entered that Camp, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, lend an Army of thirty thousand to help the Romans: one of which, 3000, of the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any of these three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such news of the riches and welfare of Hannibal's men, that all his fellows at home are the less unwilling to follow Adrubal, when he shall next have a desire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when the mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipios presuming on this access of strength, divide their forces, and seek out the Enemies, who lie not far off with three Armies. Adrubal the son of Amilcar, is nearest at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Antioche. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order; but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Agas the Son of Gefso, hearing the news, will make use of their distance, which is five days march, and by running into the furthest part of the Country save themselves from being overtaken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Soldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army, leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his Brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Agas and Adrubal the Son of Gefso, are not studying how to run away; they find no such necessity. They joyn their forces together, and with Publius Scipio, and lay to him so hardly, that he is driven to keep himself close within his Trenches; wherein he thinks himself not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Malantius, Prince of the Maspians, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritaniam, in the Region called now Tremizem: to whom the chief honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Incibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suffetani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be strait shut up, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indubius upon the way, leaving T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the Camp. He meets with Indubius, but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Namian horde appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides; neither are the Carthaginians far behind; but come to fast upon him in a Reay, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, yet fighting and animating his men, where need most requireth, is struck thorow with a lance, and slain: very few of his Army escaping the same destiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty days after. At his meeting with Afrubal, the Carthaginian Mercenaries all forsake him, pretending that they had war in their own Country. If Antiochus, where Afrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Herodotus takes it, a Ciliberian Town, this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly believe, that they were won by Afrubal, and easily persuaded to take as much money for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their lives. Cn. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them, and not less unable, without their help either to resist the enemy, or to join with his Brother, maketh a very violent retreat; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Afrubal pursues and harpeth him: and Mago with Afrubal the Son of Gisco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his Brother after him. Scipio flees from them all by night, but is overtaken the next day by their horde, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, unfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he finds of ease affording on every side: which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-ladders, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in sunder; and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that saving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his Camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they who were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and throw themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's Camp, on the North side of Iberia, fearful (as may be supposed) of his own life, since his General, with two names of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a noble spirit; who having gathered together the scattered Soldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Soldiers, being to chafe a General by moit voices, prefer this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Afrubal the Son of Gisco coming upon them; this L. Martius to encourage his men (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slain) and admonishing them of their present necessity, that he bears the Carthaginians into their Treaches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but he wisely sounds the retreat; recovering the fury of his Soldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness grows, in enemies lately vanquished, and now again little better than slain: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former security; and, utterly despising him, set neither Corps de garde nor Sentinel, but rest secure, as if no enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Soldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no advantage more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being undertaken. They are soon persuaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of service. So he leads them forth by night, and steals upon the Camp of Afrubal; where, finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleep, or very drowsie, he enters without resistance, fires their Cabins, and gives a terrible alarm; so that all are affrighted the Carthaginians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Camp, Martius hath well possessed, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping down the Rampart; which as many do, as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Afrubal the Son of Amilear, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two Camps he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But left perchance any should have escaped, and give the alarm before his coming; Martius hastens to be there as soon as they. By which design speed, he comes early in the morning upon this further Camp; which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman Shields, foul, and bloodied with their former execution, he drives head-long into flight, all that can save themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirty seven thousand of the enemies perish in this nights work; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the Camp of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slain; and that in another battle with Afrubal, there were slain ten thousand more; besides four thousand three hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Livius therefore hath elsewhere well observed, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battles. That whilst Martius was making an Oration to his Soldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Livius reports as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Martius got a great name, which he might well do, if with so small forces, and in such distress, he could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far less than that which is here set down.

Of these occurrences L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good service, whatsoever it was, but setting it out in his wife, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vice-gerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto him, he filled himself Proprietor. The Fathers were no less moved with the tidings than the case required; and therefore took such careful order, for supplying their Forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies levied to serve that Province could be sent away, yet could they not stay a day for for defence of the City it self, but shipped them in all haste for Spain. As for the title of Proprietor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in usurping it: foreseeing well, that it was matter of ill consequence, to have the Soldiers abroad make choice among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Provinces. Therefore Claudius Nero was dispatched away with all convenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about six thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well that about these times, the affairs of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and offered means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise the victories of Martius would ill have served, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alps. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Festus; he found there tokens of the overthrows received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends; whom how to reclaim, it could not easily be devised. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Afrubal the Brother of Hannibal; whom he found among the Asturian, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapidarius, out of which there was no issue, but only through a strait, whereon the Roman seized at the first coming. What should have tempted any man of understanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find; and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, that Afrubal seeing himself thus locked up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition that he and his Army might be thence dismissed. That he spent many days, in entertaining parley with Claudius about this business. That night by night, he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages out of the danger, and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, he stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Afrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no less cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needful that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far less value. Howsoever it was; neither this nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Soldiers, which had chosen Martius their Proprietor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good services, had repeated their election, and sent a Proprietor whom they fancied not to well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needful to work regard in the Barbarians, and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons, C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the Son of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the war into Africa; where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned; especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other virtues that purchase love; of which qualities, who great use he made, shall appear in the memoir of his actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, favouring a little too much of the great Alexander's vanity; how he used to walk alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; how a Dragon (which must have been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entering her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them not better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this Noble City might seem not only to have surpassed other Nations in virtue of the generality, but a life in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, that when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there desert not any Captain of the principal Citizens offer himself as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; that the people of Rome were much amazed thereto; That when the day of election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on a high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreams; and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Proprietor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Afrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences which I find in the two partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joynted M. Junius Silianus, as Proprietor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Centuriæ Gallies, with which they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarragona along the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province; which he entertained with such a Majesty, as bred a wonderful opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him; and so much the greater was their fear, by how much the less they could give any reason of it. If we must believe this, then must we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of a young man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (as some think, all the next Year) he did nothing; but spent the time perhaps, as his forefathers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprise was against new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with 25000 foot, and 2500 horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. He assailed the Town by Land and Sea; and won it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence upon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if some Fishermen of Tarracon had not discovered unto Scipio, a secret passage unto the Walls; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing upon a demy-Iland, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Western side of the Walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fishermen of Tarracon had found; and finding some part thereof a shelf, whereat at low water men might pass knee-deep, or (at most) wading up to the Navil, Scipio thrust thierinto some companies of his men; who recovered the top of the Walls without resistance; the place being left without guard, as able to defend it self by the natural strength. These falling suddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City, easily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livie himself cannot certainly affirm; but is said to say, that some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceive how great a vanity it was to say, that all the wealth of Africa and Spain was contained in that one Town. But therein into before we all the Spanish Hostages (or at least of the adjoining Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie: restoring them unto their kindred and friends in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks, due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacesians, nearest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, and joined with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, K. of the Ilergetes is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himself as commonly fugitives do of the pleasure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies, but rather excusing this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no unsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio: then could nothing have been devised more vain, than this Oration of Indibilis their King, excusing as new, his taking part with the same, when he should have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans never masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won unto himself the assured love and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginians

Generals, when they heard of this loss, were very sorry: yet nevertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, that a young man, having stoln a Town by surprize, was too far transported, and over-joyed, that that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle, which would alter his mode, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine own conjecture; I should be bold to say, that the Carthaginians were at this time busy, in seeking forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them undertook new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occasion, late down before Ilora. And in this respect I would suppose that it had not been much amiss, if the passage over the Lake had been undiscovered, and the Town held out some longer while. For howsoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to such good issue upon the first day: yet in the generality of the business between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Adribal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him.

Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gessio, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingering War of taking and retaking Towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal the son of Anibalcar, went to a greater enterprise: even to fight in trial of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell in that another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but bear the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal's his Vanc-curers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drove them into their Trenches, and made it all apparent, even by that small piece of service, how full of spirit the Romans Army was, and how dejected the enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the other side, by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he strongly encamped himself: and in the mid-way between the top and roof of the Hill, was also another Plain; into which he defended, more upon bravery, than he might not seem to hide himself within the Trenches, and for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazard of a battle, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climbed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drove both men and Elephants headlong, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flee. Out of such a battle, wherein he had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troops, to have marched toward the Pyrenes, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gessio, are reported after this to have consulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have too long detained us.

SECT. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Polthumius the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joining with the E. lians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoiced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage of such mighty aid, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans corn into his own barns, and to drive away their Cattel to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled Towns in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Cattle of Canne: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and the Spring following, until corn were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such employment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Canne. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first coming, want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened to hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious success, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battle; if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessities to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the walls of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unless they would freely yield it. But this great part of the care and travel was past, when for many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies to Rome, were like to receive a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege unto that proud City, which so long had held them in subjection. Thus the winter was passed over joyfully, saving that there came not any rydings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring grew on: and of the promised supply there arrived no more than only the Elephants. How late it was that these came, I find not: only we find, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, save one, that he brought over the Alps, had been lost in his journey through the Maritimes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse for this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perfwasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly

Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a safer, though a further way about, to pass along through Spain and Gaul, as he himself had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the Journey: than to commit the main strength of their City, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needful provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seek, as well as he can, to satisfy his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the year served, he took the field: and having finished what rested to be done at Capisnum, sought to make himself Master of some good Haven-town thereabout; that might serve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse which they might pretend by want thereof To the same purpose and to do what else was needful, he sent Himilco unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to satisfy all quarters of Italy, yea, the Isles of Sicily and Sardinia, since the siege of Rome must needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill Journey, of it, being met, or overtaken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slew above two thousand of his men, with the loss of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped far better. By help of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petelia, or Petilia, by force; after it had held out some months. He won likewise Consentia, and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yielded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good government under which the Roman Subjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanians, and others, whose earliness in rebellion may seem to prove the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Sovereignty, an were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefit allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for help: where their messengers received answer from the Senate, That the public misfortunes had not left means, to relieve their Associates that were so far distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadors they are termed, as well as others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman Subjection, that had a private jurisdiction within themselves) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Father, nor to give them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Town, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation again: and having thoroughly considered all their forces remaining plainly confessed, that it was not in their own power to give any relief. Wherefore these Embassadors were willing to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own safety, as having already discharged their faith to the utmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some months; and having driven in vain to defend themselves, when there was no apparent possibility, gave to the Carthaginians a bloody victory over them; by being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assaults.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them unto terms of great extremity. For whereas in a great bravery, before their their loss at Canna, they had shewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithstanding the great war that lay upon them to near at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whiter better than at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, to the Illyrian King Pirrus they had sent for their tribute due, whereas the pay-day was past; willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver Hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius their Subject and Rebel, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear rydings little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litania; thorough which he was to pass. Against his coming, the Enemies had felled the trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Army, was entered into this dangerous passage, the Gauls that lay about the Wood, began to cut down the trees, which falling one against another, bore all down to earth, that the Romans were overwhelmed. Men and Horses, in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious work of felling many trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some wind that might have blown all down before the Romans entered, or by some other of those many accidents, where to the device was subject; I do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done, and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardy, a Country now to civil, was infected in elder times, that of Posthumus his skull, being cleaned and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy vessel for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome, the amazement was no less than the calamity. But sorrow could give no remedy to the mischief: and anger was vain, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none, neither do I find, that there was a second time demanded; this we find that with Pleuratus, and Serdaitus, Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even terms; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their duty, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having assured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leisure to look into the doings abroad, he sent Embassadors to Hannibal, with whom he made a League, upon these conditions, That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman war, until it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the Spoil therein to be gotten, should be left intire unto the State of Carthage; and that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army should pass into Greece, and there assist Philip, until he had subdued all his enemies (which were the Enolians, Thracians, King Antiochus and others) leaving feebly unto him the full possession of that Country, and the Isles adjoining. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by divine providence, which therein shews it felt; not (as Herodotus falsely terms it, and like an Abbeis) envious or malicious, but verily just and Majestical in upholding that unpeakable greatness of Sovereignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadors that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and people, and offer his help in this time of great necessity. These news were so welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should lead them the way, and shew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey fell wilfully into the Camp of Hannibal, who entertained them after a better fashion, and concluded the business about which they came, upon the points before remembered. In their return homeward they happened again unluckily to be detected by the Roman Fleet, which mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chase. They did their best to have escaped: but being overtaken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had served them, said it again, That having been sent from King Philip to make a League with the people of Rome, they were not able by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to go any further than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than before; and (which marred all) Gesio, Bellar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratify the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquisition served to find all out: so that at length Hannibal his own letters to K. Philip were delivered up, and the whole business confessed. The Embassadors and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome; where the chief of them were cast into prison, and the rest sold for bondslaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding as was agreed before, only with some loss of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed, thinking that what heavy weight this Macedonian war, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their shoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble resolution, and suitable unto that, whereby they kept off the storm, that else would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more easy with small force to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that she very reputation of a King of Macedon, joining with Hannibal in such a time, would have sufficed to shake the allegiance, not only of the Latins, and others, their most faithful subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all privileges of the City, it will appear by the following success of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quingentum Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begun. Philip was busied about the Sea Towns, that looked towards Italy, setting feeting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum, which he won, and so returned to Apollonia again. The Epiris craved help of M. Valerius; or rather accepted his kind offers; who had none other business to do. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Town-men in good order, but not to keep out the Romans, of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspicion. Valerius therefore easily regained the Town, and sent thence a thousand men, under Nevius Crispus, an undertaking and expert Captain, which got by night into Apollonia. There made a notable fall, and brake into Philip's Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his Camp, and raise the siege. The King pursued (as it is said) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his Fleet from Oricum, stopped up the mouth of the River, so that he was fain to burn his ships (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furnished of carriages by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation always enemy to the Crown of Macedon; and easily persuaded them (being so affected, as hath elsewhere been shewed) to make strong war on Philip, wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moved the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania; after which they had gaped long, and whereof the Roman was as Babel in making promise, as it already it had been his own. So a league was made between them; and afterward solemnly published at Olympia, by the Ætolians, and by the Romans in their Capitol. The conditions were, that from Ætolia to Cercyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Country should be subdued, and left unto the Ætolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Provision, to hold no longer than whilst he abstained from doing injury to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the only point whereof Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalf, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, unless it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reserved for the Lacedemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or favoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Serdaitus: the first of which reigned at Pergamum in Asia the less, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of, the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so far from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates are thrust into the Treaty rather to give it countenance than for any readiness which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet awhile the only men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had Poland, was said to court the title of Nauwarre, was said to court the title of Rachel. Philip was not idle, when he heard wherewith the Ætolian tended. He repaired his Army, made a countenance of war upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infect the Kingdom of Macedon; waited the Country about Oricum and Apollonia, and over-running the Pelagonians, Dardaniens, and others, whom he held suspected, came down into Thessaly, whence he made them as if he would invade Ætolia. By the chance of this Expedition, he thought to stir up all the Greeks adjoining, against the Ætolians whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Country. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaching into Greece he left Perseus his Son and Heir, with four thousand men, upon their borders; with the rest of his Army, before greater business should overtake and intrange him, he made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Medes, that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whensoever the King was absent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians, in hope to subdue the Ætolians their daily enemies, in hope to subdue the Ætolians their daily enemies, and win their little Country, yet he should be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Otricoli and Nepesin, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently situated to let in on them; and assigned them unto the Ætolians according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians to dye (as we say) every Mothers Son to die, in defence of their Country; together with the great hate of the Macedonian (who laid aside all other business) to succour these his friends, caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Acarya, which they took: the Romans assailed by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the Spoil.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keep the war on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman help, Attalus out of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved by his own jealousy of Philip's greatness; though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principal Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titular, he took in very loving part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being joined with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battles; and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him, and used their best means to get it. And when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, instead of making submission, proposed him such intolerable conditions, as ill seemed vanquished men to offer; and might therefore well testify, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being besieged in their own Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This fear being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever; and thrust a Garrison of their own, and some Roman friends into Elis; which threatened Acchaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the Streight from Nauropolis, waited the Country in a terrible bravery; wherein Philip required them, coming upon them in great haste from the Neuman Games (which he was then celebrating) and tending thence faster away, but nothing thither than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no less than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navy into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians; and upon greater reason as being more interested in the success of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Romans Quinqueres. Wherefore it behoved him to use the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aid came somewhat too late; which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needful that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaïans his principal Confederates. But in attacking their Town, he was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman Garrison, which drove him back with some loss. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment in his retreat from Elis: rather he had given testimony of his personal valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slain under him. He had also soon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattel which they had brought together in a place of safety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily under a low tree, had torn off one of the horns, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horn was well known, and the tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar; and not only the borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but some Captains of Philip easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ran into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thousand men to assist his friends the Achaïans. He also took order, to have beacons erected, that might give him notice of the enemies doings, upon whom he meant formerly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill favourably; especially in the Isle of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it: where also the strong City of Chalcis was likely to have been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hasty marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the City of Opus: this City, lying over against Eubœa, Attalus had won more through the cowardice of the people, than any great force that he had used: now because the Roman Soldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum and taken all to themselves, it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his tharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tydings of Philip's arrival, made him leave all behind him, and run away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships, finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this misadventure, or tydings of Prusias to Bithynia: his invasion upon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus return home, without staying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Troene, Trisona, Drymus and many small Towns in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more bravery than importance, against the Ætolians. In the mean season, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been busie in Peloponnesus, but hearing of Philip's arrival, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chuse two new Kings, and to conform themselves to their old manner of government. But their estate was so far out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the City, proved no less unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycergus a Tyrant rose up among them: upon whom succeeded this Machanidas, and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for fear of the Achaïans, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speak more hereafter.

Philip entering into Achaïa, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Country; spake brave words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to do with an Enemy that was very nimble, and made War by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaïa; but could no where find them, such haste they made, for fear of being overtaken. But Philip, he said, was not always prosperous: he should one day light upon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and fill to their loss. The Achaïans were glad to hear these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he restored unto their Nation some Towns that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megabolians their confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymaïans, that had been taken by the Romans, and sold for slaves, he sought out, redeemed, and put in quiet possession of their own City. Further, passing over the Cyniatick Gulf, he fell upon the Ætolians; whom he drove into the Mountains and woods, or other their strongest holds, and wasted their Country. This done, he took leave of the Achaïans, and returned home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants, and animated them so well, that they refted fearless of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make war upon the Dardanians, ill neighbours to Macedon; with whom nevertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himself Master of the Sea, the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ran along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good success added much reputation unto the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make strong war upon the Ætolians, at their own doors. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceived against against their Confederates, or some fear of danger at home, when Afrubas was ready to fall upon Italy; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therefore being driven to great extremity, were fain to sue for peace unto Philip; and accepted, upon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempromius with 10000 foot, 1000 horse, and 35 Gallies, came over in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he had been invited to Dyrrachium and Apollonia, making a great noise, as it with these his own forces he would work wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The K. presented him battle, but he refused it; and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himself close within the walls of Apollonia, making some overtures of peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not to great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as he Philip to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royal offer that he made them, to serve their turn in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not firm any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his need of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Army, or to fresh his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Only once they came to his help, which was at his last journey into Achaïa. But they were gone again before his arrival: having done nothing, and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip with his own Navy, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This wretched dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hannibal's tricks, whereby Hannibal to bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly to hear that to great a K. made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as envy could suggest, to persuade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian wars to mighty a Prince; whom the change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrify the Romans, and compel them to send part of their forces from home, that might find this Enemy work abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the war, be urged unto the prosecution, by his own necessity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges: yea, farce to the labor of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might address their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africa, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsel of Hannibal and his fellows were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as far as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their late protest which they most pretended. And this was part of the reason, why he began the building 1000 Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithless promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the war, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had willingly entered into trouble for their sakes; but they despaired him as if the quarrel were merely his own, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the War, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Episcopi, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should receive in three or four Towns of Ætolia, which they had recovered by this War, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inferred into the Covenants, that somewhat might seem to have been gotten. On the other side, the Acarnanians were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip; who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Country about Apollonia, then did the Romans standon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would seem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions somewhat to their loss.

The Confederates and Dependents of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaïans, Bœotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Episcopi. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Roman descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus, Pluratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Messenians and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, helike, as having agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by themselves most likely) comprised in their league with Philip were also inserted by the Romans; that were never less in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians; they stood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing in all great actions. Yet the setting down of their names in this Treaty, served the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busy people, and ministered occasion to renew the War, when means did better serve to stop it.

SECT. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The nobles affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their Common-wealth.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many enterprises at once, they still followed all by the halves; and walled more men and money to no purpose, than could have served (if good order had been) to finish the whole War, as far shorter space and more themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the less harmful, if their care of Italy had been fought as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal to weary himself with expectation of their promised favours; which being ill deferred from year to year, caused so great opportunities to be lost, as a Conjuratour could have desired. The death of Publius, and destruction of this whole Army in Gaul; the legun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of their friend in Syracusa; with great alterations to their prejudice, in the whole life of Syracusa; as also that War, of which we last spoke threatened from Alexandria, happening all at one time; and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have sunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that was decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diversity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered matter unto Hannibal, or such as Hannibal was, whereupon to work. For though it was in the power of Carthage to perform all that was decreed for Italy; yet could not that prohibition hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their several Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many excusations offered had been thoroughly prosecuted; as though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperity of Hannibal in his Italian war, should have been strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender Troops, slender Carthage, slender Italy, War in Syracusa; the lingering aid which they sent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten down; their trifling with Libya; and (among all these their attempts) their hairy catching at Syracusa; little deferred to be thought good reasons of neglecting the main point, whereof all the rest had reference. Rather every one of these Actions, considered apart by it self, was no otherwise to be allowed, as discreetly undertaken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition. That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatness, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the late at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himself to necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Nepes, Cume, and other places: being loth to spend his Army in an hard siege, that was to be recovered for a work of more importance. Many others he made upon Nola, but always with bad success. Once Marcellus fought a battle with him there, yet under the very walls of the Town; having the assistance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined to the rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great marvel; his forces being then divided, and employed in sundry pairs of Italy at once. Nepes was even in those days, a strong City: and needed a years work to have taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was always fruitless. Upon the Town of Cume they of Cape had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chief Magistrates of the Roman during, them (as being also Cumans) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would confer about their general good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made flow to entertain; but privily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus; the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of War, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should have been Publius, Albanus, that was lately slain by the Gauls; after whose death Gracchus was chosen, as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Avarice either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they feigned so to have done, because this was the first time, that ever two great opportunities to be lost, as a Conjuratour could have desired. The death of Publius, and destruction of this whole Army in Gaul; the legun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of their friend in Syracusa; with great alterations to their prejudice, in the whole life of Syracusa; as also that War, of which we last spoke threatened from Alexandria, happening all at one time; and that so nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among so many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have sunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the first year, yet at least the second, sent over to Hannibal the forces that was decreed. That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serve to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatness, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the late at home.

The

The Carthaginian Army was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yielded; and withal to abide (as it must do) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it self, was driven in the mean time to alter his course of war: and instead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invasion upon the whole Country, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Country of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal; as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul, when Hannibal, having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the loss before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their Lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done, when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to be a Sovereigns. They held it their own, that they should be provoked by such as thought they had dominion over them; whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; & gave unto their old, more easy means to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intensive as necessity constrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship; and joined with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield; and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon just reason, commended, that he did not stand upon nice points of formality, or regard what men might think of his ambition, but caused himself to be chosen with Marcellus, knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, served to put the Campanians in fear, that Capua it self should be besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum) and having with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-town of Campania; about which he spent three dates in vain, hoping to have won it. The Garrison in Puteoli was 6000, strong; and in their duty so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good success, could only throw his anger upon the fields there, and about Nepes, which having done, and once more (with as ill success as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilst he was in his progress thither; Hannibal made a journey against Beneventum; and T. Gracchus, the last year's Consul, having from Nucerina, met him there and fought with him. Hannibal had with him about 17000 foot, Britannians and Lusitani for the most part; besides 12000 horse, very few of which were Italians, all the rest Numidians and Moor. He held the Romans work four hours, ere it could be perceived to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his soldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaves, had received from their General a peremptory denunciation, that this day or never they must purchase their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The fierce reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vain labour, afforded by their General, of cutting off the slain enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindered the service by imploy-

ment of too many hands in a work so little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cut away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all they have liberty immediately after the battle, it should have the day. This encouragement made them run head-long upon the Enemy; whom their desperate fury had soon overthrown; if the Roman horde could have made their part good against the Numidians. But though Hannibal did what he could, and pressed to hard upon the Romans battle, that four thousand of the slaves, (for fear either of them, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatened before the battle unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to save himself by flight, when the Griefs of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the loss. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand, most of which were horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman General gave unto all his Soldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but unto those four thousand, which had recoiled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they lived in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink churcheless standing, unless sickness forced them to break his order. So the victorious Army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Soldiers were feasted in publick by the Townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custom of slaves manumitted) with caps of white wool. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterwards hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his Father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first battle, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Clanne, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans, through industry, by little and little, repaired the great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and longer after this, their Treasury was so poor, that no industry nor art could serve to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any surplage, that might be exchanged for other needful commodities. Few there was in Italy that continued to pay them tribute; which also they could worse do than before; as living upon the same trade, and subject to the same inconveniences, which ensleaved Rome it self. Sicily and Sardinia, that were wont to yield great prey, hardly now maintaining the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained; and could now do least for his Country, when most need was; as also the number of them was much decreased; so as money should be raised upon them by the Pol, yet it must be far less than in former times. The Senate therefore diligently considering the greatness of the war within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the peril, wherein Sicily and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals, declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome, the threats of the Alaccianians, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to find him work at home; the greater threats of Alfabrad, to follow his Brother over the Alpias foon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortal dangers; were driven almost even to extreme want of counsel. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the 2 Scipio's from Spain, they resolved upon the only course, without which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to assembly. Wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor laid open the publick wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be naking of money for victuals, weapons, apparel, or the like things needful to the Souldiers; but that suchas had stuff, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities and labors, until the war were ended. Hereunto he to be effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain, as well supplied, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, Marcus Attilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redress of disorders within the City, were chiefly intensive to the correction of those, that had mis-behaved themselves in this present war. They began with L. Cæcilium Metellus, who after the battle at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellow-men prisoners at Cannæ, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath, but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp, with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the wars, after them which the Laws appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtful only in reputation: but greater weight was added thereto, by this Decree of the Senate, following, That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicily, there to serve until the end of the War, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainers of the Army beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to chuse or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those whose unhesitant or unfeignly behaviour fell not within the compass of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publick Offices of service, unto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their mis-behaviour. Generally, they had the oversight of mens lives and manners; and their censure was much revered and feared; thought it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could do) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But, besides the care of this general Tax, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick Works, as mending of High-ways, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porticoes, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-ways, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors coming out to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customs, and other publick Revenues to farm: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholden to this office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were always of that Order, and careful to uphold the reputation thereof. But the Common-wealth being now impoverished by war, and having small store of Lands to let, or of Customs that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with pursuing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations; or, if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kind; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly as the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travel; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the war. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had been enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, until the City were in better case to pay. In this general inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as far forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widows lying under Patronage, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Quæstor kept a book of all that was laid out for the sustenance of these Widows and Orphans: whilst the whole flock was used by the City. This good example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad; so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in so great want.

The 1200. Talents wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded half so much commodity, as might be laid in balance against these miseries, wherein their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright, the calamities of this War did rather enable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom the forthwith undertook, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, wherein she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metal grew more hard and solid; and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happiness of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon has judiciously observed) That a State, whose defence or item is small, may apply force to be foundation of a great Monarchy, which chiefly comes to pass, where all regard of domestick prosperity is laid aside, and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say that our Age hath been a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived itself to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alva, were it so, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as, by extreme indolence, and straining themselves to fill their publick Treasury, they are all grown wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Common-wealth, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times; we may truly say, That the City was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautiful, should in all reason have been more dear unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens and subjects of Rome could have believed their own interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great virtue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of those ways, by which Kingdoms rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

SECT. XIV.

The Romans win some Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The Siege of Capua. Two Victories of Hannibal. The Journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the War: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Town of Castine, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the assistance of his Collegue. Nevertheless, the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, that many such things, as were not at first to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted unto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campani dwelling therein, grew fearful, and craved parley; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, wherein they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversely reported) Marcellus seizing upon a Gate, entered with his Army, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fifty of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul, who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deferred Commendations, by holding his word good unto these fifty; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himself after the Roman fashion, with some equivocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsum in Gallia taken by the Marshall Monks, when I was a young man in France. For will it be entertained parley about composition: the besieged ran all from their several guards, upon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a party of the Walls unguarded, entered by Scalado, and put all five the Governour unto the sword. Herein the Governour of Mount Marsum committed two gross errors; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parley without Pledges for assurance given and received. Some such oversight the Governour of Castine seemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monius, was very honourable. When this Work was ended, many small Towns of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken or slain, about 25000. of the Enemies; and the Country grievously wasted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum, waiting to hear from those, that had promised to give up the Town. But M. Valerius the Roman Prætor had thrust so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stir. Wherefore the Carthaginians were fain to depart, having wearied himself in vain with expectation. Yet he waited till the Country, but contented himself with hope, that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence towards Salapia, which he chose for his wintering place; and began to victual it when Summer was but half past. It is said, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his Winter more timely than otherwise he required, he did not like the Romans whom necessity informed, to make their Summer last as long as they were able to travel up and down the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicily, whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take the order for the Province, as need should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than the Consulship, we will speak hereafter.

The new Consuls chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the Son of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needful for the publick service, to employ oftentimes their best able men: and therefore made it lawful, during the war, to reconstitute their Officers, and chuse such as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his Son: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his Son unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his Son rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an Axe with a bundle of Rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reverence, to pass by him on horse-back, which was against the custom. But the Son perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feet. The Father cheerfully did so, saying, It was my mine the Son to make royal, whether thou didst understand thy self to be Cæsar. Cassius Albinus a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who after the battle at Cannæ, had holpen the Carthaginians

an into that Town, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend, came privily to this Conful Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conful purposed to follow old examples; and to make this Atinius a pattern to all Traitors; using him as Camillus and Fabriceius had done those that offered their faithful service against the Falisci, and King Pyrrius. But Q. Fabius the Father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, that Rome should be thought more fain to revolt from the Romans; than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he should be sent to the Town of Capua; and there kept as prisoner, until they could better resolve, what to do with him, or what use to make of him. Hannibal understanding that Atinius was gone, and among the Romans, took it not for sorrowfully; but thought this a good occasion to seize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might seem rather severe, than covetous, he sent for the wife and children of Atinius into his Camp; where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them as partakers of the treason, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himself. Fabius the Conful shortly after came to Arpi: which he won by Scalado, in a stormy and rainy night. 5000 of Hannibal's Soldiers lay in the Town; and of the Apines themselves, there were about 3000. These were thrust foremost by the Carthaginian Garrison; when it was understood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Soldiers held the Townfmen suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdom to trust them at their backs. But after some little resistance, the Apines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: protesting, they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In process of this discourse, the Apine Prætor went unto the Roman Conful; and receiving his faith for security of the Town, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is that Hannibal men continued to make good resistance. For when almost 1000 of them that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and serve on the Romans side, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians should be suffered to pass forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman again, with little other loss, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time Cliturnus was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus one of the Prætors; and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Prætors, 112 Gentlemen of Capua offered their service; upon no other condition, than to have their goods restored unto them, when their City should be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the general hatred of the Campanians towards Rome, it served to discover the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Bruttians, which had yielded themselves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captain, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in foraging the Country, was slain by Hanno; with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to find. Long he waited ere he could bring his desire to pass; and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence; he contented himself with taking in some poor Towns of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracy, who lay at Rome as Embassador, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his company the next day were to be closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome: where they suffered death as Traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or severity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their business the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discovered. Wherefore they sent again to Hannibal; and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico, and Philomenes, two of the chief among them, used much to go forth of the Town on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldom or never they missed of their game; for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not seem to have been abroad upon other occasion: From the Camp of Hannibal it was about three dayes journey to Tarentum, if he should have marched thither with his whole Army. This caused his long abode in one place the less to be suspected; as also, to make his enemies the more secure, he caused it to be given out, that he was sick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their business in order, he took with him 10000 the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before break of day, made all speed thitherward. 80 light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for fear left he, and his troop following him, should be discovered: It had been often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governor, when he heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a sign, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gave order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their booty, and send them gone. But when it grew dark night, Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came close to the Town: where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to show his arrival; Nico, that was within the Town, answered him with another light, in sign that he was ready. Presently Nico began to set upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen, Philomenes went toward another gate; and whistling, as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heavy, that scarce two men could stand under it. So heavy, that scarce two men could stand under it. The Porter opened the wicket; and forthwith entered two young men, laden with wine, to be worthy the hail had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largeness of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-spear: and letting in some 30 armed men, fell upon all the watch; whom when he had slain, lain, he entered the great gate. So the Army of Hannibal entering Tarentum at two Gates, went directly towards the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their General, and sent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willd the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheer. All the Town was in an uproar: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unskillfully founded by a Greek in the Theatre: which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governor fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadel, that stood in the mouth of the Haven, whence he might easily perceive the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal sending the Tarentines, gave them to understand, what good affection he bore them, inveighing bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten such spoil as was to be had of the Soldiers goods in the Town, he addressed himself against the Citadel; hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery falling forth, gave charge upon his men; who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawn on themselves as they could; and so far from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a sign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drove him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could run; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadel stood upon a Demi-Island, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall against the Town, whereunto it was joyned by a cawley. This cawley Hannibal intended to fortifie in like fort against the Citadel: to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themselves from all danger thence. His work in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the piece it self, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But while it he was busied in his works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counsel. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not pass forth, while it the Romans held the Citadel: it seemed likely that the Town would suffer want, being debar'd of accomodation of trade and provisions by Sea: while if the Roman garrison by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town standing in plain ground, and their fleets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity, though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwise buffed, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutual loss on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Confuls, prepared to besiege the great City of Capua. 23 Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hasty growth from that want of men, and of all necessities, whereunto the loss at Canus had reduced them. But to fill up these Legions, they were fain to take up young Boys, that were under seventeen years of age; and to send Comitia-ners above fifty mile round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appear servicable, and pressing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of service, whereinto they were bound by order of the City, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning to young, as if they had been of lawful age. Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campani felt great want of victuals, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by loth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoil, which the Romans had in foregoing years made upon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were closed up, as they feared to be shortly. He gave them comfortable words, and sent Hanno with an Army to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, against which they should be ready with all manner of carriages, to force themselves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of grain, that had been laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed, came no more than forty Carts, or Wagons, with a few pack-horses, as if this had been enough to victual Capua. Such was the reachfulness of the Campani. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not reach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day, against which he made provision to force them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Confuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Conful, taking with him such strength as he thought needful for the service, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make provisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carts and other Varies, lay among the Carthaginians in their camp; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set upon a great harvest. Hereupon the Conful bade his men prepare themselves to assail the enemies Camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that he was there with the first break of day. By coming so unexpected, he had well near forced the Camp on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the less desire had Fulvius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to go more leisurely and substantially to work; to send for his fellow-Conful, with the rest of their Army; and to lye between Hanno and home; that neither the Campani should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found the retreat; he saw that some of his men had gotten over the enemies Rampart. There was great booy; or (which was all one to the Soldiers) an opinion of

of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore some Ensign-bearers threw their Ensigns over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unless they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a loss. Fear of such ignominy (than which nothing could be greater) made the Souldiers adventure to do so. Next, that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Camp was won: in which were slain above 6000; and taken above 7000, besides all the store of victuals, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hannibal had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a piteous Embassy to Hannibal: putting him in mind of all the love that he was wont to profess unto their City; and how he had made shew to affect it no less than Carthage. But now, they said it would be lost, as Aspi was lately, if he gave not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away 2000 horse, to keep their grounds from spoil, whilst he himself was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadel, partly by the disposition, which he law in many Towns adjoining, to yield unto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, suffered death for their attempt, were some of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eastern part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Græcia. These people took to heart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, upon the like reason, had not some companies lain in their Town, which they feared that they should not be able to master. Nevertheless, they helped themselves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: against whom whilst they proffered their service to Atinius the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recolving from him, closed up their gates. A little formality they used in pretending fear, lest the enemy should break in together with the Romans, in saving Atinius himself, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chief men were unconquainted with the practice) whether they should yield to the Carthaginian or no. But this dissipation lasted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, easily prevailed in the rest; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good success, and hope of the like, detain'd Hannibal in those quarters, whilst the Consuls fortifying Beneventum to secure their backs, addressed themselves to the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befall the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Consul, was slain, either by treachery of some Lucians, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lye in Beneventum, there to secure the back of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hindrance of that business. The Volones or Slaves lately manumitted, forsook their Ensigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decafe of their Leader; so that it asked some labour to seek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, and drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hostility, which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above 1500 Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better; insomuch that it caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went several ways: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius unto Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compass about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vanities to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be trusted with the leading of 5000 men. The Fathers were unwilling in such a time, to reject the virtue of any good Soldier, how mean forever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of 8000: and he himself being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up to many volunteers, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) slain, scarce 1000 of them escaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneius Fulvius a Roman Praetor with 18000 men was in Apulia, very careless and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he hasted to visit him: hoping to deal the better with the main strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should have cut off those forces that lay in the Provinces about, under men of small ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men for jolly, that needs they would have fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with 3000 of his lightest armed, in places therabout most fit for ambush. Then offered battle to Fulvius, he soon had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape alive; leaving all, save 2000 of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blows, received the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Nevertheless, all care was taken, to gather up the small reliques of the broken Army: and that the Consuls should go substantially forwards with the siege of Capua: which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls fate down before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Suessula, to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whoever would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should have his pardon, and be suffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their own strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed up, they sent messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long journey in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadel: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium, upon advertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how, a few daies since he had chafed the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither again, and fend the Romans going as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almost without inrenewed round. As for Hannibal himself, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and therefore give him leisure to do what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Eastern parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it self in a tedious siege. Thence he lingered, and thereby gave the Consuls time both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilst he himself pursued hopes that never found success.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their term of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua, retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The Town-folk often fell out, rather into a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to lull them by famine. Yet against the Capuan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) he Hannibal used to thrust out some Troops, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the Capuans usually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who scorned to take foil at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore provided that some active and courageous young men should learn to ride behind the Roman men at arms; leaping up, and again dismounting lightly, as occasion served. These were furnished like the Vetites, having each of them three or four small darts: which alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick upon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kind of service, they much disheartened in the main. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans; and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible a manner as they could devise: setting all their multitude of unserviceable people by the walls, which with a loud noise of Pans and Bassoons troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himself to the Capuans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repulsed them, that he drove them at length back into their City. Nevertheless, in pursuing them to their gates, he received a wound that accompanied him in short space after to his grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to this task by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman Camp was even at point to have been lost, and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slain upon it, fell into the ditch, and filled it up in such sort, that their bodies served as a bridge to the assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitives that could speak Latin well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Consuls name, That every one of the Souldiers should fight for himself, and fly betimes unto the next hills, for as much as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serve. The fraud was detected; and the Army having sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it self, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome to self: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadel, had well-near lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadel, nor the City of Tarentum were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himself and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater use: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, even to set upon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City the danger of War that threatened Capua. This, he thought, would be a means, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, unto the defence of their own home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the Capuans, should well enough deal with them a-part. Neither did he despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His only fear was, lest the Capuans, being ignorant of his purpose, should think he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themselves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtle Numbidian; who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himself thence over the innermost Trenches into the City. The Journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good success resting in the suddenness of his arrival there. Wherefore he caused his men to have in a readines ten daies victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Army over the River Tiber. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals, by some fugitives, had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore, he acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diversity of men opinions in a case of such importance. Some gave counsel, to let alone Capua, yet, and all places else, rather than to put the Town of Rome into peril of being taken by the enemy. Others were so far from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, should judge himself strong enough to win Rome; and therefore stoutly did, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serve the turn well enough, to keep him out, and find him thence, if he were so unwise as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to judge, what was needful to oppose him. So it was referred unto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought best: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raise their flags, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took 15000 foot, and 1000 horse, the choice of his whole Army; with which he hasted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal having passed over Fulvius, burnt up all his boats, and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down by the people of Fregella: which, as it stopped him a little on his way, so it made him the more grievously to spoil their Lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him driving the Country, & killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The Messengers of these news came apace, one after another into the City, some few bringing true advertisements, but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the Streets and Temples in Rome were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their hair, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to give their advice, if it were asked, or to take directions given by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with soldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came news that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was lying in the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his return home, and entering into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might lose nothing by coming into the City in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should have equal power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in passing over Vulturnus, and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Consuls, and Fulvius incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater, so took they more careful and especial order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Arno, or Arce, thence miles from the Town, whence he advanced with 2000. horse, and rode along a great way under the Walls, viewing the siege thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by the care and diligence of the Senators. Above the rest, one accident was both troublesome, and not without peril. Of Numidians that had shifted aside, and fallen (upon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some 1200. then in Rome, which were appointed by the Consuls, to pass through the Morn, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Colatina, where it was thought that their service might be useful, among broken waives, and Gardens walls lying in the Suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal, bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the walls. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the fires were so full of cauel, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoining, that the passage was stopp'd up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the house tops, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had been Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should have authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed over Arno, and presented battle to the Romans, who did not wisely if they understood it. It is said, that a terrible shower of rain, caused both Romans and Car- thaginians to return into their several Camps, and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking up and clearing as soon as they were departed: a wonder: certain it is; that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten daies provision, could not endure to stay there, until his victuals were all spent. In which regard the Romans, if they suffered him to wait his time and provisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well advised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibal's coming to the City, how great to ever it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared less than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soon abated. Hereupon it helped well, that at the same time the Supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, were sent out of the Town, and went forth at the Gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panmix terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known, or no cause answerable to the greatness of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such as men have fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his soldiers to disarm themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great fear of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus practise a foolish uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had sent the As into the Camp. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withal a great magnanimity, whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no less, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seem to have been diminished. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemy, and taken away the disgrace of that fear, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recovered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing under the value, but as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This dignity coming to his ear, incensed Hannibal forward, that he made port-sale of the Silver-smiths shops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome, as if his own title to the houses within the Town were no whit worse, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground. whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance which they justly had conceived, Hannibal, to make them of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed unto himself, this Journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what spoil he could to the Roman Territory, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he passed like a tempest over the Country, and ran toward the Eastern Sea so fast, that he had almost taken the City Rhegium before his arrival was feared or suspected. As for Capua, he gave it lost: and is likely to have curied the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieve that fair City, since he had no other way to vent his grief.

Q. Fabius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, what who-so would yield before a certain day, might safely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to understand, that they were abandoned, and their cause desperate. To trust the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his own civil defects, told him, that it was a vanity: and some faint hope was given by Hanno and Byfar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Town, that Hannibal should come again, if means could only be found, how to convey such Letters unto them as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by some Numidians, who running as fugitives, out of the Town into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an escape thence with their packers. But it happened ere they could convey themselves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town, and the Letters of Byfar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make War against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions, wheresoever they lye, there also should the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking such a course, have we gotten those victories at Trebis, Thrasymene, and Cannae. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himself, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another away, as if it were his only care, that the City should not be taken in his full view; promising to make a desperate assault, if he would come no more adventure to it, upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Byfar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his best; and now began to faint under the burden of that War, whereon as afterward he protested he was vanquished by Hanno and his Persians, in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had been sent ever by the Hannoniens, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so, justly might they curse their own malice, which had cast them into this remediless necessity. Howsoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfeit fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them back into the Town. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans, so that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, caused them to assemble and consult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The bravest of the Senators and such as a few years since, had been most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper, telling them, that when they had made good cheer, he would drink to them such an health, as should free them from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies freight upon their bodies. About seven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their lives together by drinking poison. All the rest hoping for more mercy than they had deserved, yielded simply to discretion. So one of the Town-gates was set open; whereas a Roman Legion, with some other Companies, entering, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconsuls laid Irons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what store of gold and silver they had at home, sent them into safe custody; some to Cales, others to Torinum. Touching the general multitude, they were reserved unto the discretion of the Senate, yet so hardly used by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this adversity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received; yet was he not inexorable to the Capuans; as having loved them well in former times, and having given his Daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom he spoke before. But this facility of his Colleague made Fulvius the more hasty in taking vengeance; for fear, left upon the like respects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoveful to the common safety, and honour of their estate. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theramus, and from thence to Cales; where he caused all the Capuans prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the less apt to follow the vain hope of the Capuans; and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calatinenses, and Subitines, people of the Capuans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made allow the like submission, for very fear and want of ability to resist. They were therefore used with the like rigour, by Fulvius; who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their young Gentlemen burning with fire of revenge got into Rome; where they found means by night time, to set on fire many houses, that a great part of the City was like to have been consumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave and other sufficient reward for any free-men, that should discover who those incendiaries were. Thus all came out, and the Capuans being detected by a slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the sum of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to their defects. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people held them in a manner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become supplicants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day, and confined unto several places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the Town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautey and commodious site: but no corporation or form of polity was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Provost was every year sent to govern over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest afflict, and most importunate, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present War. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oyl being far spent, and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

SECT. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicily, held War against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

WHILST things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicily by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: above 30000 being up in arms, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Hierofcar with his Son Hysfus, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so careless, as in the rest of their main undertakings, at the same time. Yet it had been better if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that main business in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindered the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Hierofcar with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Marius the Praetor; who lay sick in the Province; and not more weak in his own body, than in his train. But whilst they fought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiring those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such, as may seem to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Afridbal furnished the Bald, with a complete Fleet and Army, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and near kinsman to Hannibal; it so fell out, that the whole Fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was cast upon the Baleares; to be beaten, and in such evil plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with 20000 foot, and 1200 horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custom of the Romans, to preserve and uphold in their several Provinces, the greatness and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had been first subdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron, the first conqueror, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. In every the Romans held very pure intelligence in every Province, and had always in a readiness fit men to reclaim their subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far off. Yet was Hierofcar so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arm his Mariners; without whom he could not have made up that number of 22000, whereof we have spoken before: he landed at Calaris, or Caralis, where mooring his ship, he passed up into the Country, and fought out the enemy. Hysfus, the Son of Hierofcar, had then the command of the Sardinians; he left unto him by his Father, who was gone abroad into the Country, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battle to the Romans at his own discretion. So he rashly adventured to fight with an old Souldier; by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day above thirty thousand of his followers. Hysfus himself, with the rest of his broken troops, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Island; whither Manlius pursued them. Very soon after this defeat came Afridbal with his Carthaginians; too late to win all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soon enough, and strong enough to save the Town of Cornus, and put a new spirit into the rebels. Manlius hereupon with-drew himself back to Calaris; where he had not stayed long ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his assistance; their Country being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the rebels, with whom they had refused to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris; where, if he had stayed a little longer, Afridbal would have fought him out with some blemish to his reputation. But the fame of Afridbal and his company, appears to have been greater than was their strength. For after some trial made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battle; wherein he slew twelve thousand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians thirty thousand. Four hours the battle lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans; by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had been broken in their unprosperous fight, not many days before. The death of young Hysfus, and of his Father Hierofcar, that slew himself for grief, together with the captivity of Afridbal himself, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Army fled into Cornus, whither Manlius followed them, and in short space won the Town. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, following the example of Cornus yielded unto the Roman; who, imposing upon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best suited with the nature of their several offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The war in Sicily was of greater length, and every way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victory brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby, not only favourers of their own, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Country, by annexing the City and Dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the battle at Canna, the old King of Syracuse died; who had continued long a steadfast friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this present war. He left his Kingdom to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo his Son, that should have been his heir, being dead before. To this young King his successor, Hieronymus appointed fifteen tutors; of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he judged most likely to preserve the Kingdom, by the same Art, whereby himself had gotten, and so long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of so many Coadjutors, began to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and said that he was was able to rule the Kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he caused others to do the like; hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to pass in a fort as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of government, gave himself wholly over to his pleasures; or, if he had any regard of his Royal dignity, it was only in matter of exterior show; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never seen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his Son. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behaviour, suitable to his outward pomp, he gave proof, that in course of life, he would revive the memory of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, lustful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him; so that such of his late tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to live in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death to itself.

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thersa, continued in grace with him, and were his Counsellors, but not of his Cabinet. These, howsoever they agreed in other points, were at some difference about the main point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleasure, which was set on change; but Thersa, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amity with Rome. Whilst as yet it remained somewhat doubtful which way the King would incline, a conspiracy against his person was detected by a Groom of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would speak any thing; but yielding (as it seemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confessed, that he had been set on by Thersa; whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were near in love or place unto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime whereunto they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and never shrunk for the matter: assuring themselves, that the resolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all escaped, and soon after found means to execute their purpose. The King himself, when Thersa was taken out of the way, quickly resolved upon siding with the Carthaginians, where he was very inclinate before. Young men, when first they grow masters of themselves, love to seem wiser than their Fathers, by taking different Courses. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessity, had of late been such as might have been termed excessive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he took order for his own estate, that depended upon theirs.

But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers far off, regarded only the things present, the weakness of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his Grand-father had laid out in vain, to shoulder up a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal, who readily entered into good correspondence with him, that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicles, Carthaginian born, but Grand-children of a banished Syracusan. These grew into such favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when

App. Claudius the Roman Praetor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuse; his messengers were dismissed with an open scold. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himself, saying, that he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; to wonderful was the victory, as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league; with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he should reign over all Sicily; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied with what they could get in Italy. At these doings Appian Claudius did not greatly rise; partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertain more quarrels than were enforced upon them by necessity; and partly (as may seem) for that the reputation, both of himself, and of his City, had received such blemish, by that which happened unto him in his journey, as much discounted him when he came into Sicily, and forbade him to look big. The money that Hiero had bestowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their necessity, this Appian was to carry back unto him; it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater reason than their present fortune would allow. But instead of returning the money with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been notified abroad that he should do, the war against Philip King of Macedon (whomsoever we have spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside vain-glory, and send word after him, that he should consign that money over to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwise wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimity, into such a pitiful tune of thanksgiving, as must needs have bred sorrow and commiseration in to true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronymus the new Kings.

But whilst Hieronymus was more desirous of war, than well resolved how to begin it; his own death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the State of Syracuse; which thereby might have prospered more than ever, had it been wisely governed. Hippocrates and Epicles, of whom we spoke before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men, to solicit the Towns, and persuade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himself with an Army of fifteen thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium a City of his own Dominion; hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste; and accept him for Sovereign. There the Conspirators took him on the sudden, as he was passing thorow a narrow street; and rushing between him and his guard, struck him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed; and the found of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus had little courage to revenge their Masters death. Yet, for fear of the worst, a great largess was promised unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought so effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcase to lie unburied. This news ran quickly to Syracuse; whither whither some of the Conspirators, taking also of the Kings horses, posted away; to signify all that had passed, to stir up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his followers would make offer to usurp a tyranny. The Syracusans hereupon presently took arms, and made themselves Masters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island; being yet uncertain what to do: between desire of making himself a sovereign Lord, and fear of suffering punishment as a Tyrant; if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes; putting him in mind of that well-known Proverb, which Dionysius had used; That a Tyrant should keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on horse-back. But fear, and better counsel, prevailed so far, that Andronodorus, having let up his hopes, diffembled his affections, and deterred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a speech unto the people; telling them that he was glad to see, how prudently they behaved themselves in to great a change; that he had stood in fear, lest they would not have contained themselves within the bounds of discretion; but rather have sought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to ravish their liberty performance, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, and surrendered up the charge committed unto him, by one that had been an evil Master both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors chosen (as in former times) to govern the City, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But such was his desire of Sovereignty, and so vehement were the indignations of his wife, that shortly he began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himself strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had been with the Syracusian Prætors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronimus, they, according to instructions of their Captain, had done him, will't he lived, what service they could; and that now they were desirous to return home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed, and with a convoy, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good Soldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made show; they were more mindful of the business for which Herbessus had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselves into the tomesons of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitives, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themistius, that had married Harmonia, the Sister of Hieronimus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his own, and of his wife. But seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he revealed to matter the one, that revealed all to the rest of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slain out of hand: and afterward accursed to the people, of all the evil which they had done, whilst Hieronimus lived, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to usurp the tyranny themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were necessary to this dangerous treason: and that the unique issue of these women would never cease to work, until they had recovered those royal ornaments and Sovereign power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to dye, and executioners presently fell by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserved this heavy sentence: but Heracles, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sosippus was a lover of the Commonwealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronimus, that being sent Ambassador to King Ptolemy, &c. he durst not return home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration when it was too late, together with some pitiful accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude, that (pardoning themselves) all cried out unto the Authors of so foul a butchery. Being thus incited against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfy their anger, they called for an election of new Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slain: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should have little cause to like. At the election were present a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of soldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the less that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But having striven in vain, and seeing that the people stood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicily, they gave way unto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practice. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by such fugitives, and mercenary soldiers, as were most troublesome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly understanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word unto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would never be kept sincerely, until this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides, fearing to sustain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the war, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himself unto the Leontines, whom he persuaded to rebel against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all late served one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streets the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enjoy the Freedom purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should bear Dominion over those that that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that such their arrogance should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was given by one article of the League, made out of late by the Romans and Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had been subject to Hiero and Hieronimus, should henceforth be Vassals unto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due, Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedom, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it unreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been subdued by the same hand, which took liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yielded unto Syracuse, and been subject unto that City, by what form loever it was grounded; this claim of liberty was rather reasonable, than just. Nevertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inasmuch that when messengers came soon after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargains for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to observe the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This preliminary answer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracusians, who offered him their assistance in doing justice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forthwith took the business in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault Leontium was taken, all save the Castle; whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and stealing thence away by night, conveyed themselves into the Town of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had won the Town, was the same, which other Roman Captains used after victory, to seek out the fugitive Roman slaves and renegades, whom he caused all to dye: the rest both of the Townsmen and Soldiers, he took to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoil them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slain Man, Woman and Child, and put the Town to sack. These news met the Syracusian Army upon the way, as it was going to join with Marcellus, who had ended his business before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had been sent forth of Syracuse, under Sofis and Leontines, two of the Prætors; to serve against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Soldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow soldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had been so cruelly butchered; and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best to turn their thought towards another way, and set them work in some quiet place: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their service. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischief, devising what further harm they might do;

but now so weakly accompanied, that they seemed unable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no less well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little less desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus unarmed, with Clive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the vanguard; that had greatly bound unto Hieronimus; and some of them formerly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian war, and lovingly dismissed them. These Creteans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheer, saying That no man should do them harm, as long as they could use their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this ancient ran swiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by severity, which would not serve. For when they commanded these two traitors to be laid in Irons, the exclamation was so violent against them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what course to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates devised a trick, whereby to help himself, and better the uncertain case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his own penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trusty Creteans, directed (as they made show) from the Syracusian Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines; but that it further became his duty, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City; and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the uproar was such, that Sofis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forsake the Camp, and fly for their lives. All the Syracusians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Soldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saved their lives; rather to keep them as pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They persuaded also a mischiefous knave, that had served amongst the Leontines, to justify the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the news to Syracuse; as an eye-witness. This incited not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Town with causeless indignation. In good time (said some) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would have dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whilst they were thus discouraging, and devising how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unless for want of help, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the best and wisest of the Senate, would have kept him out: but the violence of the soldiersiers to break it open. So he entered, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers till night. The next day he went openly to work; and after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all slaves and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himself and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was advertised of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a half of the Town, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracusanians, which were oppressed by Tyrans; and to puniſh those that had murdered and banished so many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Town, might be suffered to return and enjoy their own; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicles briefly answered, that if their errand had been to him, he could have told what to say to them: but since it was directed unto others, they should do well to return, when those to whom they were sent, had the government in their hands. As for the War which they threatened, he told them, they should find by experience, That to belieg Syracuse was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he sent them gone; and returned back into the City. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quick and easy winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of walls as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kind of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terror in the very beginning; but did his best both by Land and Sea. Nevertheless all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill success of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the virtue of the Defendants, or any strength of the City, that bred such despair of happy victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuse Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero, the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of war, as being in this extremity put in use, did more mischief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Cannon, or any instruments of Gunpowder; had they at that age been known. This Archimedes discouraging once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place void of footing, whereon a man might stand. For proof of this bold assertion, he performed some strange works; which made the King enreat him to convert his busy unto things of use, that might preserve the City from danger of enemies. To such Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberal sciences, to submit learned Propositions, unto the workmanship, and gain of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an Author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed unto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither mult we rashly tax a man for Plato, with the imputation of supercilious superiority, or affected singularity in his reprehension. For'th' hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were published: and being once made known, to be undervalued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; and things that everyone could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discovery, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he underwent before and after it in a familiar and most homely example we may see most apparent proof. He that looks upon our English Brewers, and their fer-vans, that are daily exercised in the trade, will think it ridiculous to hear one say, that the making of Malt was an invention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philosophy. Yet is not the skill of the inventors any while the less, for that the labour of workmanship grows to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handi-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being devised and bettered by great scholars and wise men, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such as could flubber things easily over, and feed their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others that have, or would seem to have any secret skill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kind of injustice, that the long travels of an understanding brain, beside the loss of time, and other expense, should be cast away upon men of no worth; yield less benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Envy have in it any thing allowable and natural, as having Anger, Fear, and other like affections; it is in fact such case as this; and serveth against those, which would usurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Nevertheless, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to bear unto the generality of mankind, alter the example of him that suffereth his Sun to shine upon just, and unjust: it will appear more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves and publish unto the world, those good things that lay buried in their own bosoms. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a mischievous use. For'th' secret of any rare Artis contained in it the skill of giving some deadly and irrecoverable poison: much better it were, that such a Jewel remain close in the hands of a wife and honest man, than being made common, bind all men to use the remedy, by teaching the world men how to do mischief. But the works which Archimedes published, were such as tended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, serving unto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusanians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to use them, but reserved so much to his own direction, that after his death more of the same kind were not made, nor those of his own making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his science; and done especial benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanical trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certain of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these Archimedes had sundry devices, of which any one fort might have repelled the assailants: but all of them together heaved the multiplicity of his great wit. He shot heavy stones, and long pieces of timber, like unto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight.

weight. These afflicted such as lay far off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual volley of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an Iron grapple were taken by the prow, and hoisted up, shaking out all the men, and afterwards falling down into the water. Some by frange Engines were lifted up into the Air, where turning round a while, they were broken against the rocks or cast upon the rocks; and all them were so beaten, that they durst never come again to any second assault. In the like fort was the Land-Army handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like hail, did not only over-whelm the men, but brake down the Roman Engines of battery, and forced Marcellus to give over the assault. For the remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get near unto the walls, they should be (as it were) under the point-blank, and receive no hurt by these terrible instruments, which were wound up hard to shoot a great compass. But this vain hope cost many of the assailants lives: For the shot came down right upon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very far off. This did to terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the wall, they ran away, crying out, That Archimedes his Engines were ready to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that fear, against the cause whereof he knew no remedy. If the Engines had stood upon the walls, subject to firing, or any such annoyance from without, he might have holpen it by some device, to make them unrevocable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streets behind the walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to use them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all provision of victuals, both by Land and Sea.

This was a very desperate piece of work. For the enemies having to goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely to soon to be confuted with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before a strong City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsel to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there to deal with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horses and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make war upon the Romans in Sicily by Land. He took many Towns; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians did yield unto him. To remedy this mischief and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, began to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Pelorus and Herbessus, which yielded unto him. He took also Megara by force, and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusanians, or else because Rome was at this time poor, and his Army much have somewhat to keep it in heart. His special desire was to have saved Agri-genum: whether he came too late; for Himi-

co had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumstance that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had not misfructured. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately lifted out of the City, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, intending to join his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other; and the Romans being in good order, got an easy victory against the dispersed and half unarmed Syracusanians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joining with Hippocrates, ran over all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battle to Marcellus even at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and distubled the City. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed to again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and flew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Army before Syracuse, that he might not seem to have given over the siege, went unto Leontium, where he lay intensive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turn all his forces to Agri-genum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as unable to prevail; and he himself was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feasible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remainings before; and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that the continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfil his desire. Especially he assayed to prevail by treason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusan Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practice with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easy for them to do, because the Town would hearken to no parole. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to run away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where he talked in private with some few, as he had been instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators used to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a filther-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were grown to the number of fourscore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they like Traitors put to death. In the mean while, one Damasippus a Lacedæmonian, that had been sent out of the Town as an Embassadour to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicles was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not far from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometry, fell to numbering the stones; and making an estimate of the height, judged it less than it had been formerly deemed. He re-wrote he acquainted Marcellus who finding better notice to be taken of the place; and causing that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great fleet was to be held unto Diana, which was to last three days: and that, because other good cheer was not to plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicles, to gratify the people, had made the more large distribution of wine. A better opportunity could not be withheld. Wherefore Marcellus in the dead of the Festival night, came unto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuse was divided into four parts (or five, if Epicles were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some pieces, he had the commodiety of a better and safe lodging, with good store of booty, and better opportunity than before, to deal with the rest. For there were now a great many as well of those in Acradina and the Island, inner parts of the Town, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto composition, as being much terrified by the loss of those parts, which the Romans had taken and taken. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harm, or none they did, unto those that were sheltered under strong houses; although it may seem, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurnished with help, since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegades, were more careful than ever to defend the rest of the City: being sure to be rewarded with cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilear was sent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of Acradina and Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Affiliants were repelled. Nevertheless they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as frantically besieged, as he himself did besiege the Town. But the pellence at length consumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat less) afflicted with the same pellence, inasmuch that Bomilear did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilear wanted no desire to do his Country service; but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arrived at Pagani-nus with a strong fleet: where he stayed, being loth to double the Cape; for that the winds did better serve the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he stood off into the deep; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durst not Epicles return into Syracuse, but went to Agriumentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Soldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates and his Army, lay as near as they could safely, unto Marcellus, and some of them, in a strong Town three miles off. These had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicily was given as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had stayed there long enough; and had cause to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong again. He therefore agreed both with the Citizens, and with the Soldiers that lay abroad, that they should be Masters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws; yet suffering the Romans to possess whatsoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicles had left his charge, were put to death, new Prators chosen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitives disturbed all. These perceiving their own condition to be desperate, perished the other Mercenary Soldiers, that the Citizens had bargained only for themselves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they presently took Arms, and fell upon the new chosen Prators; whom they slew, and made election of six Captains that should command over all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Soldiers; excepting only the fugitives. The Treaty was therefore again set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delayed; either by some fear of the Citizens, that had been (as they thought) proof of the Roman avare in the sack of Epipola, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken, or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might enjoy the liberty of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subject to Rome. Marcus a Spaniard was one of the six Captains that had been chosen in the last communion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercenaries, holding his own particular benefit above all other respects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This crafty Agent perwaded Marcus, that the Romans had already gotten all fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himself to the will of the Roman General. By such hopes the Spanish Captain was easily won, and sent forth his own brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratify the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracusans, cannot well be commended as honest: neither was it afterwards thoroughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been such as deserved not to be requited with the ruin of his Country: much less, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, should minister unto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired Soldiers; and therefore were faine to yield unto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately slain many of the principal of Epicles's followers; and many of themselves had also been slain, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire unto peace. What though it were true, that the Rafalcians, and some ill advised persons joined with the Soldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their own City which was taken? Though therefore the Roman General, in a treaty of peace held with the Syracusans, to make a bargain under-hand against them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his return home: but the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracusans with gentle words, and promise of good usage in time to come; than to restore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, to great, wealthy, strong, and many waies important. Nevertheless if we consider the many inconveniences and great mischiefs whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by evil neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed; we may truly affirm, that it received so small benefit, by becoming subject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all foreign enemies, domestic conspiracies, and such Tyrannies as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the necessity of banishing, or murdering, the most worthy Citizens; as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a host of the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the jealousie, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her first foundation any such long time of happiness, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure under the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition, whereof by Marcellus his victory it was thoroughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serves not to make injustice the more excusable: unless we should approve the answer of that thief, who being found to have stolen a silver cup from a sick man said, He never leaves drinking.

By the reason of Marcus, the Roman Army was let into possession of all Syracuse: wherein the booty that it found, was said to have been no less, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage in self, that maintained war by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherein Syracuse was miraculously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched, save only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicles, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitiful accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himself. He was so busie about his Geometry, in drawing figures, that he hearkened not to the noise, and uproar in the City: no, nor greatly attended the rude Soldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him, and caused his body to be honourably buried. Upon his Tomb, as he had ordained in his life-time, was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them; which he first found out. An invention of so little use, as this may seem, pleased that great Artist better, than the devising of all those Engines, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would think the money lost, that had been spent upon a Son, whose Studies in the University had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Towns in Sicily yielded unto the Romans, except Agriumentum and a few places thereabout. At Agriumentum lay Epicles with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good pieces of service, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withal made his own name great. By his persuasions, Hanno and Epicles adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town, and not but themselves as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was he more valiant in counsel, than in execution. Once and again he set upon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them heartily into their Trenches. This bred envy in Epicles and Hanno; especially in Epicles, that having been lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authority from the State, thought himself wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent unto him this Mutines, to be his companion, and to take upon himlike as good a man as himself. The indignity seemed the greater, when Mutines being to Repulse into Hydruntis, for the pacifying home troubles there among the Nomadicus advised (as did formerly Hanno and Epicles) not to meddle with the enemy, until his return. So moved therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battle unto Marcellus, before he fought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required; which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with those that came against them. But whatever disproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds between the Captains. For however the people of Carthage would give authority by favor; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of war. The Nomadicus, having before conceived some displeasure against their Captains; and being therefore faine of them gone away to Hydruntis, were much more offended, when they saw that the vain-glourious envy of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a foolish desire to get victory, without the help of Mutines their Country-man. Wherefore they sent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident, for that it was not their purpose to let themselves be enemies that day, but only look on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten by whom they had been misused. They made good their promise, and had their desire. Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily fell upon the enemies, that he broke them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, drove them back unto Agriumentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himself, and not to have hazarded a battle without need; the Romans would shortly have been reduced into terms of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus was shortly faine to leave the Province & soon upon his departure, the Romans landed in the Island a supply of 8000 foot, and 3000 Nomadicus horse that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians unto rebellion. The Roman Army consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, took it very haughtily, that no good service done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent far from home, and not suffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his country-men the Nomadicus, and like an honest man, did what he could for those whom he served, without concerning against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration, and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prator, used all diligence, both to pacify his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland towns that had rebelled; and though he could not hinder Mutines from over-running all the Country; yet he hindered the Country from revolving unto Mutines. Above three score Towns, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which Agri-genum was the principal, and far bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despite of the Romans; not only to the succour of his own adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrary part. But Hannibal, instead of being pleased with all these good services, was filled more and more with envy, against the man that performed them. He had (believe) received instruction from old Hannibal at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have a share in the honour of the Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should have been regarded more than all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Assistant, or Director: He took away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his own Son, thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spiteful dealing occasioned the loss of whatsoever the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignity offered unto their Country-man, being such a brave Commander, that they offered him their service to requite the wrong, and were thenceforth absolutely at his own disposition. M. Valerius Leuvinus, the Roman Consul, was newly come unto the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook these indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by those that bore all the way in Carthage, he thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his own game, and forsake that City, which was likely to perish by the evil counsel that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Country-men had lately done, content himself to see his Adversaries reap the bitter fruits of his own malicious overweening, and to suffer that harm, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conspired against them to deliver up Agri-genum, and to help to expel them utterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his advices. Neither was there much cunning needful, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians had forcibly seized upon a gate; whereto they let in some Roman Companies, that lay near in a readiness for the purpose. Hannibal, when first he heard the noise, thought it had been no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when making haste to pacify the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betook himself to flight: and saving himself, with Epistides, in a small Bark, let sail for Africa; leaving all his Army and adherents in Sicily, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued Masters of the whole Island.

Leuvinus the Consul having taken Agri-genum, did harsh execution of justice upon all the Citizens. The principal of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaves, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the money that was raised of the booty. This was indeed a time wherein Rome stood in no less necessity of gold than of steel; which may have been the reason, why Leuvinus dealt so cruelly with the Agri-genians. Nevertheless, the same of such severity bred a terror among all the Dependents of the Carthaginians, so that in great haste they fought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themselves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treason; and six only stayed to be won by force. These things done, Leuvinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about four thousand men from Agri-genia, that were a company of fellows, bankrupts, and banished men, accustomed to live by spoil of others in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their own occupation against the Bruttians; a thievish kind of people, that were enemies unto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good account; accompanying the two Scipios in their journey against Antiochus, and therein doing (as is said) a very especial service. So by this enterprise of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this war, the entire possession of this Island; which they wanted when it began.

SECT. XVI.

How the war passed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory of Metaurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good services done in the Island of Sicily, he had granted unto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the war, but was lain to leave his Army behind him in the Province. He stayed not long in Rome, before he was again chosen Consul together with M. Valerius Leuvinus, who succeeded him in the Government of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making war against King Philip in Greece. Great Complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done unto them, in obliging their great friendship to the people of Rome; in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance; as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him; willing them to be men to themselves to the Carthaginians, that had helped them in their necessity; and not unto the Romans, whom they had kept out. Thus each part having found good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controversy, as best agreed with the benefit of their own Common-wealth, blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring that booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopeful promises, as hath been shewed before. The two new Consuls war, as their loss should fall out; the one in Italy, Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not seem hindered by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his business with them was dispatched, he gently undertook the the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family, to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicily, whose doings there have been already rehearsed: but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Soldiers to the war, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Navy. They were all of the poorer sort, that used to be employed in Sea-services, especially in rowing. These could not live without present wages: neither was there many enough in the Treasury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of private men; who in this necessity of the State, were driven to sustain all publick charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter unto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or do, in a case of such extremity. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already incurred to much, as well it could undergo; and somewhat more than could with honesty have been imposed upon it. Nevertheless it was impossible to maintain the war against the Carthaginians; or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That since the common Treasury was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no persuasions would be so effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it with the people, they also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, that every one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasury, all the money that he had; and that no Senator should keep any vessel of gold, or plate whatsoever; excepting one Salt-feller, and a Bowl wherewith to make their offering unto the gods; as also a Ring for himself, with such other tokens of ingenuity for his wife and children, as every one did use, and those of as small value as might be. This advice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuse to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publick necessity could no otherwise be holpen; every one was contented, that his private estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it suffered wreck, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimity deserved well that greatness of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet; Marcellus went forth of the City against Hannibal, and Leuvinus toward Sicily. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard services: neither did his Carthaginians seem to remember him, and think upon lending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the loss of Capua: which gave them cause to look unto themselves; as if in his help there were little trust to be repaid, when they should stand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all the Towns he suspected, and thereby to diminish his Army, that he should not be able to keep the field; or else he must leave them to their own fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealousy grew so outrageous, that he sacked and wasted those places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himself; and make unprofitable to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him: and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The Town of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus, and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that served under Hannibal; which was a greater loss, than the Town it self. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect, without getting the consent of one Dafnus, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dafnus in private, and was by him accused unto Hannibal. But when he was convicted and charged of Treason, he so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently provoked his accuser with the false fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter devised out of meer malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and feeling that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to press his adversary anew, and urge him from time to time, with such lively reason; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Previously after this, the Consul took by force, Maronia and Melies, Towns of the Samnites; where-in he flew above 3000 of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once; but was fain to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being grown stronger in the field than he. The best way was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themselves with ill speed in many petty enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow business of far less importance; had now at length refused, to lend presently the great supply, that had been so long promised and expected. This, if they had done in better season; Rome it self might have been stricken down, the next year after that great blow received at Canna. But since that which is past cannot be amended; Hannibal must force himself to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty success would come time enough. For Masaniassa was at Carthage with 5000 Numidians, ready to set sail for Spain; whither, when he came, it was appointed that Adribal should forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had been so much talk. These news did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrify the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans, to prevent the threatening mischief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his Brother, Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own; and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Praetor, lay near unto Herdenna, to get the Town by practice. It was not long since, near unto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdenna ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As soon as he came, he offered battle to the Roman Praetor, who accepted it with more haste than good speed. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout, and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himself, with 12 Tribunes or Colonels, were lost: of the common Soldiers, that were slain, the number is uncertain; some reporting seven, others thirteen thousand. The

The Town of Herdonia, because it was at point to have yielded unto Fabius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting torch to each that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude, whom he followed among the Tarentines and Metapontines. The Consul Atrebius hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good cheer; for that he would shortly take the enemies prize; for he followed the Carthaginian space; and overtaking him at Novisiro in the Country of the Lecani, fought with him a battle: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted until night, and ended, by reason of the darkness, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Vesuvius they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often, and fought to bring the enemy within danger of battle, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus passed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that year to besiege Tarentum; which if he could win, like as that scarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Collegue, and Marcellus (whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the year before) to press the Carthaginian to hard, as he might have no leisure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge; for he thought no Roman fiercer than himself, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Canniffum, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battle, put upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had no mind to hazard much in fight; but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong until the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the opportunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be lusty, and to batte foundly this hot-spirited Roman Captain, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battle; where, in Hannibal had the victory; took six Ensigns; and drew of the Romans almost 3000, among which were some of mark. Marcellus was, as Belians, and bade towards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these and many other like words, which they were ashamed to hear, he did to vex them, that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their General, they besought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies for-most, that had lost their Ensigns the day before, bade them be careful to win a victory, whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their shameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet; and therefore was ready to fight again; since all other motives continued the fame, and his men had been heartened by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred up by desire of revenge, and of repairing their honour lost, which affections gave a sharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battle Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at a dear rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if 8000 of the Carthaginians were slain, and 3000 of the Roman side, in this next battle, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing the victory, that he was forced to retire. Nevertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his business at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul about the same time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucani, and Volentes, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns; whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or busy doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Silurian thieves, which Lucius had lately brought from Adgatonis, was then also set on work to besiege Caulonia, a Town of the Bruttians: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, laid down before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needful to carry it either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Town, a good part were Bruttians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof he gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these news: and said, that if the Bruttian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intricacy of his Mistress, to do what he would have him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, will his Soldier to convey himself into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Soldier grew acquainted with this Bruttian Captain; and partly by his own persuasions, partly by the flattering intricacy of his sister; won him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the business, and resolved how to order it; the same Soldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part the Bruttian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Bruttians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Soldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but as happened in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nicias, Democritus, and Philomenus, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthago, who commanded commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come to Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Bruttians. This slaughter of the Bruttians, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seem to have won the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone; and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture, as if they were fighting; he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so near, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he halted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibals; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few daies together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, befooth himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two young men of the same City; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot was given, or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Romans, the journey to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed again; but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their wars: for they got every where, save only at Caulonia; where they had lost a company of such few fellows, that it may seem good fortune, to have been to rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered; that the Legions of Cannae, and those unhappy Companies that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicily; where they lived, in a fort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of men, and impositions of money: in every of which years they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear, or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently fend home their people this was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to pass within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new soldiers were daily pressed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never returned. Such talk was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicily, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of twelve, That they should boldly deny unto the Romans their farther help. It was thought the likeliest way to obtain peace: whereof otherwise they few little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Towns make such declaration, and protest their disability of giving any further help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to return home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campani or Tarentines; but the offspring of the Romans; and no less partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not serve, the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could, and that they had had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was then that the Romans made the other twelve Colonies did not imitate these twelve; but showed themselves willing to undergo whatsoever should be laid upon them, without thinking under the burden. This their offer was to highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithful Colonies, were brought into the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commendation of all their former good services, this their present love unto the State was magnified, and thanks that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelve Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to detain them in the City, nor yet to dismiss them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own consideration of their ill deserving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelve people would have wrought in those that were willing to help the State. If Asdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then must the Romans have betaken themselves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subjects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italy, with hopeful and fortunate success. Nevertheless, they were fain to open their most privy treasury; and thence rake out the gold that had been laid up to serve them in cases of greatest extremity. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consul, to let him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army, and to provide that Asdrubal might not pass from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easy success at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any

The Town of Hepherus, because it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had professed with the Enemy, carried away the multitude, whom he bestowed among the Tunians and Metapontines. The Consul Atretilus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good cheer; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian space; and overtaking him at Novusiro in the Country of the Lucanis, fought with him a battle: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted until night, and ended, by reason of the darkness, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Canusium they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often, and fought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battle, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus passed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fulvius considering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that year to besiege Tarentum; which if he could win, like it was, that scarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus (whom was continued the command of those Legions that served under him the year before) to press the Carthaginian to hard, as he might have no leisure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman sifter than himself, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring ever to come to battle, put upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazard much in fight; but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong until the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be lusty, and to bat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captain, that would never suffer them to be at quiet; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battle; where in Hannibal had the victory; took six English; and slew of the Romans almost 3000, among which were some of mark. Marcellus was so impatient of his dishonour, that he rated his men, as Felans, and bade cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these and many other like words, which they were ashamed to hear, he did vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their General, they besought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies forward, that had lost their English the day before, bade them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their shameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet; and therefore was ready to fight again; since all other motives continued the same, and his men had been terrified by the late victory. But the Romans were hurried up with desire of revenge, and of repairing their honour lost, which affections gave a sharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battle Marcellus got the victory; which he purchased at a dear rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if 8000 of the Carthaginians were slain, and 3000 of the Roman side, in this next battle, the difference was no greater, than even to recompense the late received overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Nevertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his business at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul, about the same time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucanis, and Vulturni, that willingly yielded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns; whom Fulvius entertained in loving sort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had been authors, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Laevinus had lately brought from Agatena, was then also set on work to besiege Caulonia, a Town of the Bruttians: and nothing was omitted, that might serve to divert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salernitani, laid down a siege to Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed useful to carry it either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Town, a good part were Bruttians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whose brother served under Fabius. Hereof he gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these news: and said, that if the Bruttian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Mistress, to do what she would have him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his Souldier to convey himself into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Bruttian Captain: and partly by his own persuasions, partly by the flattering intreaty of his sifter; wan him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the business, and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Bruttian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Bruttians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereas the Army was lying. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as happened in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very ordinarily. Nico, Democritus and Philomenus, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthago, who commanded commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come to Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Bruttians. This slaughter of the Bruttians, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, so end that he might seem to have won the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great, whereof the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming; but he was to fear, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he halted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost. This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibals; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few days together, so near as he was unto Tarentum; and thence departing to Metapontum, he thought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money, finding such easy success at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the journey of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spain, nor any any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Nevertheless, it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and thence were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at less warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiss to note, that since the Romans, being in to great a necessity of money, were driven to furnish the Army in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stock that was left: it must needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far less than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had been not as yet won it: howsoever Levi rather inclines to those, who say that he soon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Ardubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following. After the great battle at Cannae, Hannibal had lost much time about Cannae and Naples, in seeking to make himself Master of a good haven; for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turn his principal care to the Eastern parts of Italy, where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Ardubal was (though far later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his Brother was past, that therein he might make a party against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from hearkening to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and weariness of their adherents, together with the fear of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy, did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of this conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrify them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the year following they were devising how to break out: as contrarywise the Roman Propraetors, partly by terror of severe judgments and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills, and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong War upon Hannibal without more temporising; persuading themselves, that in battle they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of Engines, sending for a fleet out of Sicily to help him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the time of whose approach, made Crispinus desert from his enterprise, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Vendia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Consuls daily offered band. This great man of War had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and fought to take them at some advantage; relieving his own numbers as full as he could unto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but fought to compel the Enemy to battle, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Vendia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, wherein the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and save their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waite their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should straggle from the Roman Camp; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he would to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground Marcellus thought it fit to remove their Camp: unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows, who discovered not themselves until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger; to the weak assistance of no more than forty horsemen, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorough with a Lance and fell down dead; then began every one to shift for himself, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two covered their camp: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundle of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funerals, according to the custom of those times: and crowning his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a bow of gold; and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this Crispinus bethought himself, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal: who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had happened were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard to give no credit unto any letters therewithal signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite.

requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there first from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Kings; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readines, for such employment as he should think needful. The device was plain, and no less plain was the revengeful mind which he bare against that City, because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapines hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any sign of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readines, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troop of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened fair and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when six hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapines, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this stratagem, hasted away to Locri, whereunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Cecil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal's Vantcuirs, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Camp, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the surviving Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Common-Wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other business; whereunto himself was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after he died. Then was it thought needful, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so near unto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men as were not only valiant, but well advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Dares, M. Marcellus, by losing himself so strangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto rash leaders. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the alloy of a more staid wit. The Fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had born the same office long before. This M. Livius had been with L. Amilius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this War. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned, Amilius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankful Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battle at Cannae, it was apparent what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Amilius rather chose to yield to the forward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatness of overthrow than ever fall upon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious counsels of Tarentum, to call himself a new upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the City, and lived in his Country Grange, till vexing himself with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Levius, being Consuls two or three years ago, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented sort, as might appear, both by his carelessness in apparel, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Consuls, to poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he used to sit silent, and signify his assent or dislike to what was proposed, either in short formal words, or in passing from side to side, when the house was divided. At length it happened, that in some business weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood up and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, that he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much affected since he had left it; many brave men were lost: new ones were chosen as such as rather served to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place; and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Virtues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to say; that it was a great pity, for worthy and able a Man as this Livius, had been in this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need; yet had not used in this dangerous war. Now seeing that the Consuls sought one of them, to be chosen a Patrician: the other of necessity a Plébeian: and since neither Fabius, nor Valerius Levius, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that these could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livius would not endure to hear of this. He said it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by persuasions and examples received by the people, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himself to a Palm-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for shelter in a storm. Such unthankfulness to well deserving men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, upon some final offence conceived, without all regard of his former defects: yet when his intended Conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Nevertheless, it tell us happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at less warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiss to note, that since the Romans, being in so great a necessity of money, were driven to furnish the Army in Spain, with the greatest part of all their stock that was left: it must needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far less than fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet won it: howsoever Livie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Adribal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following. After the great battle at Cannæ, Hannibal had lost much time about Cannæ and Naples, in seeking to make himself Master of a good haven; for the landing of those forces that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turn his principal care to the Eastern parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Adribal was (though far later than had been expected) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his Brother was past, that therein he might make a party against the Romans. The loss of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from hearkning to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and wantiness of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy, did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of this conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrify them, that they retired quiet for a while. All the year following they were devising how to break out: as contrarywise the Roman Propozitors, partly by terror of severe judgments and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills, and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong War upon Hannibal without more temporising; persuading themselves, that in battle they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of Engines, sending for a fleet out of Sicily to help him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the time of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, and retire unto his Collegue, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Consuls daily offered battle. This great man of War had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and fought to take them at some advantage; reserving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compel the Enemy to battle, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and save their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should frangle from the Roman Camp, and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fit to remove their Camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows, who discovered not themselves until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as needfully compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horsemen, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. These Fregellians aided the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance and fell down dead, then began every one to flit for himself, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded: yet these two recovered their camp. The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lighters that carried the bundle of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the custom of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this Crispinus bethought himself, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal, who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had happened were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about; that his Collegue was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithal signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite.

requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arrived there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readines, for such employment as he should think needful. The device was plain, and no less plain was the revengeful mind which he bare against that City, because of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapines hereupon besought themselves, how to take their enemy in his own snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any sign of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readines, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troop of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened fair and quietly, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when six hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themselves: being laid at on all hands by the Salapines, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this stratagem, halted away to Locri, wherunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal's Vantcuors, made the Romans in all confusion hate, run to their ships: leaving all their engines, and whatsoever was in their Camp, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent unto Crispinus the surviving Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Common-Wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other business; whereunto himself was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soon after he died. Then was it thought needful, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so near unto the Enemy, without any General. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men as were not only valiant, but well advised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Dares, M. Marcellus, by losing himself so strangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whose many services in this present War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the alloy of a more laid wit. The Fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Consulship, M. Livius: one that had born the same office long before. This M. Livius had be Consul with L. Amilius Paullus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this War. After their Consulship, wherein they did good service, they had both of them been called into judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned; Amilius hardly escaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleased God to upbraid the unthankful Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battle at Cannæ, it was apparent what lamentable effects the memory of their injustice wrought: when L. Amilius rather chose to yield to the forward ignorance of his Collegue; and afterward to die in the greatest overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome. But, to call himself a new Livius upon the danger of the popular fury, As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been absent out of the City, and lived in his Country Grange, still vexing himself with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Livius, being Consuls two or three years ago, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in discontented sort, as might appear, both by his carelessness in apparel, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Consors, to poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he did sit silent, and signify his assent or dislike to what was propounded, either in short formal words, or in passing from side to side, when the house was divided. At length it happened, that in some business weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood up and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention and bade them enquire of him, had been. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many brave men were lost; new ones were chosen chief as rather served to fill up the number, than to answer to the dignity of the place; and they that were left of ancient standing, had even spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to say; that it was a great pity, so worthy and able a Man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth stood in great need, yet had not used in this dangerous war. Now seeing that the Consuls sought one of them, to be chosen a Patriarch; the other of necessity a Plebeian: and since neither Fabius, nor Valerius Livinus, being both of them Patriarchians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero; every one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livie would not endure to hear of this. He said it was unreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be chosen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by persuasions and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested injuries done by the people, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himself to a Palm-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for shelter in a storm. Such unthankfulness to well deserving men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the second King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, upon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former deserts: yet when his intended Conquest of Portugal, required the service of a man more than ordinarily sufficient; he stood no longer upon the scanning of late displeasures; but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. This is wisdom often taught by necessity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius were chosen Consuls, Asdrubal was already come into France, and waited only, to have the ways of the Alps thawed by warm weather, for his passage into Italy. The Roman used at this time the service of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment for many more, if they had known how to levy and maintain them. Of these which they had, four served in Spain, two in Sicily, and two in Sardinia: the rest were to be disposed, in several parts of Italy, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution; and would not be tied to the punctual observance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not stir out of Rome, against so mighty a power as followed Asdrubal, until he had first obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other employments; and those of the most of them, chosen Companies. It was true that two Legions appointed to serve under Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that year, among the Cisalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an addendum to the forces of Livius; to whom the War against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salernitan, near unto Tarentum, unto another of the Pretors be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, that was sent against Hannibal. Nevertheless, the Consuls, by the special instance of Livius, did obtain, that all might be left to their own discretion. For news came that Asdrubal was already passing the Alps, the Ligurians, who dwelt in that Country about Genoa, with their neighbour people, were in readiness to join with him; and L. Porcius felt word, that he would adventure no further, than he safely might. When all was ordered as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the City, each his several way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had been, when L. Amilius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and win the victory betimes; but rather they stood in fear, left all diligence, wisdom and valour should prove too little. For since few years had passed, where in some one of their Generals had not been slain; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst the two Carthaginians would forthwith join, and make short work with the other: it seemed a greater happiness than could be expected, that each of them should return home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mighty opposition, as he was like to find. With extrem difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever since the battle of Cannae: though it were to that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another Son of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed a man of more sufficiency than Hannibal himself. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Army: this Asdrubal in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, defended from the Alps like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spain. These considerations, and the like, of which fear presented many unto them, caused the people of Rome, to wait upon their Consuls out of the Town, like a penitential train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Crispinus, upon whom in the like sort they had given attendance the last year; but few either of them return alive, from a man's dangerous War. Particularly, old Salvius gave his accustomed advice to M. Livius, that he should abstain from giving or taking battle, until he well understood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, that he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victory; or by being the overthrow of his own unjust Citizens, satisfy himself with the joy of a great, though not an honest revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Asdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his Journey into Italy, such mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Livius. Yet I think it not amiss to add in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his History concerning that accident: Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spain; by reason of those Captains that were sent from the City of Carthage, to join with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus far forth Traitors, that they preferred the advantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy Son of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courage, I will not undertake, it cannot be known; since those Books which Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to us remaining only a few broken pieces. But by the spiteful dealing of Hanno in Sicily with Mutius, a better man of War than himself, whom Hannibal had sent into the Island: we may conceive, that against the Brother of Hannibal it was thought needful, by these mischievous Partisans of Hanno, to use the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Nevertheless, Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutius could not long digest. His Journey into Italy being resolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not far upon the Mines of Silver; whence he was to furnish his Expeditions. Thither came Scipio, and drew him out of his Camp; though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could or would come to his assistance. The overthrow seems not to have been so great, as it must have been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appears, that Asdrubal dealt like a provident man, and seeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, sent away all money with the Elephants before him: but stayed behind himself to sustain the Roman a while, until his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire, afterwards he gathered his broken troops together, and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed over Tagus. Then taking unto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his Brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the Son of Gisco; that thought himself the fittest man for the administration thereof. Fain would Scipio have stopped him in his Journey, by sending to defend against him the ordinary ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had sent to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly flows to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the steps of his Brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his money, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Army well entertained, and their number much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to winter in their Country, whilst that the passages of the Alps were closed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his Journey over the Alps, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he travelled thence toward their Country. For these poor men, at the first coming of Hannibal, were verily perfwaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattle; and to make spoil of that little wealth which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in process of time, they were better informed. Therefore, understanding that there were two mighty Cities, far dis-jointed asunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alps did only lie in the way: they gladly consented to take their part in the fortune of the invaders. The like affection upon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gauls. The Ligurians also joined with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Country, there was no other Roman Army near, than L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Asdrubal set upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Town. But there he lost a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his Brother Hannibal (who upon the first birth of Asdrubal he so timely, and easily passing the Alps, was about to leave his wintering Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to sit still a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could to meet with Hannibal and stop him from joining with his Brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and five hundred horse: with which he dayly offered battle to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was only driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salernitan and Apulians, unto the Country of the Bruttians, there to increase his forces: which were otherwise too weak for the Journey intended. Afterward coming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucanians; there fought unprofitably with Nero the Consul. Nevertheless, he got off; and marched away to Vesuntia. But Nero followed him, and had there again the better of him; wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joining Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assayed again, to make way by force to his Brother. So he passed onward, and came again to Vesuntia, having Nero still at his heels. Thence went he over the River Asidua, to Casunum, where he fate down, not far from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit down by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Country very well: that his Brother might with little impediment, overcome the way to Casunum; where, if he could once again deal with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Country. If this had to fall out; Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians should not have need to wish any second victory, in the naked Campana about Cannae: If such an Army as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in full strength; and the Roman not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reason afterward to say that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did bear him out of Italy; which else no power of the Roman could have done.

Whilst Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was coming to their succour: he was advertised of Asdrubal his approach by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gave notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his Brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Livius the Consul. Of these news Claudius Nero was nothing joyful. For if Hannibal could once be joyed as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparent, that howsoever the fortune of Rome should avail, for the present, any great calamity; yet the very countenance of so strong a War at home, would enforce the Latiner, and other faithful Associates to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolved, that it were better to make any desperate adventure, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose plentiful influence, if not on the field, yet within few years, was like to work most lamentable effects. It seemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to stay the progress of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readiness, that could do service in such a needful case, excepting those, that were already employed under the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himself to his own charge, which was the war against Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian Brethren, was far more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trull, with that which was the less important. Six thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making them, as if he would only step aside, to do some small piece of service near at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow-Consul. His Messengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to pass, that they should be ready to meet him with victuals, and all other necessities for his Army. Livius the other Consul at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal, within half a mile of him. In six days Nero had finished his Journey thither; and when he drew near, sent Messengers before him him, to give notice of his coming. Livie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of covert until dark night, and then enter secretly into the Camp: left the Enemy, perceiving this acccess of strength, took accordingly flame his counsels. This was done, and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, as well horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him, should be lodged and entertained by men of their own sort. Their Company was somewhat increased by Volunteers that joined with him on the way. Nevertheless it was not needful that the Quarter which received them, should be enlarged: since they had brought with them nothing but their arms. The next day they held a Council of war: wherein some were of opinion, that it were best for these new arrived Companies to refresh themselves a few days after their weary Journey, before they should be drawn forth to battle. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make use of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own Camp. Cæ Hannibal should have notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero were full of spirit: perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battle would not have been undertaken, without their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Council brake up, that the sign of battle should be hung out; which was commonly a Purple Coat over the Generals Pavilions.

Asdrubal was no less willing than the Romans to come to battle, having long desired it, and his thereto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and some of their Arms and Horses looked as though they had wanted drilling, after a long Journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the Camp: and gave order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good observation be made, whether the Enemies Camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted; that might shew their forces to be increased. The Camp, as hath been said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded once in the Quarter of L. Porcius the Prætor, did now, contrary to former custom, sound twice in the Quarter of Livius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul had there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good case, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the best way, to go luckily to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own Forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Roman; nor troubling himself perhaps with over-forgently fortifying his own Camp. Yet when he now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus: whereby to keep himself as long as he could, from necessity of battle. But whether it were so, that his guide did lead away from him in the dark, so that he could not find the way to the Forde; or whether his carriages were too heavy, and hindered his speed: far he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horse, and stayed him from passing any further. Soon after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions: in good order, and ready for battle. Asdrubal, seeing himself overtaken with necessity to fight, omitted no care and circumspection. His Gauls, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy should not, without much difficulty, be able to climb: in the right wing he stood himself with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants he bestowed in the front of his battles. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battle. Both Roman and Carthaginians well understood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was unto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion: that they were to fight with men desirous to have fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Livius the Consul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans, by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtful. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to give ground; which they needed the less; or were able now to do, being placed in the midst. Livius therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, prevailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Engines were driven to fall back. All this while Clodius Nero, labouring much in vain against a steep Hill, was unable to come to blows with the Gauls, that stood opposite unto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who, seeing his own left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compel him to remain idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his Forces and led them round behind the Forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compassed, he fell upon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flank. Here began the Victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal's battle: and falling upon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every side, the greatest part was slain. The Ligurians and Gauls escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, four were taken alive; the rest were slain: some by the Enemies weapons, others by their own guides that rode them. For when any of them, being forewarned, began to wade unruled, and rush back upon their own battles following them, the guide had in readiness a Mallet and a Chizel, wherewith he gave them a stroke between the ears, in the joint of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beasts upon a sudden. This speedy way of preventing such harm as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the Squadrons following them, is said to have been the device of Asdrubal himself, who died in this Battle.

Great

Great commendations are given to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Livie. He is said at all times to have shewed himself worthy of Amilcar his Father, and Hannibal his Brother: to have striven with great patience against many difficulties, whereto he fell by the means of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain: to have performed in this last battle all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he saw the loss irreparable, to have ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was slain. Of the number that died with him in this battle, the report of Livie and Polybius do very much disagree. For Livie saith, that the Carthaginians had no less an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Romans at Cannæ: that fifty six thousand of them were slain, five thousand and four hundred taken prisoners, and above four thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered and set at liberty. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates, there were slain eight thousand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and silver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have been as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well stored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battle of Metaurus, a parallel unto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side; and two thousand of the Romans, to have been slain. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive, and that all the rest died in the battle. Wherby it may seem that they were all Berberies: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no less in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever since it were known in what fort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal's coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to have notice of this his departure, and either pursue him, or set upon the Army that laid behind, much weakened, and without a General? Thus they talk, yet relieving their fears upon the success, with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the mean time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ran to the Temples with Vows and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsel, waiting still ready at hand upon the Magistrates; as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would ask every ones help. In brief, they were all so full of melancholy, that when the first news of victory came, there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Messengers arrived from the Consul, with Letters contained all that had passed, there was not only great and joyful concourse of all sorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private business; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) and attending their own affairs in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his Camp, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians:

and producing his African prisoners bound, sent two of them loose to give Hannibal notice of what had happened. These two prisoners might have served well enough to convince Hannibal of the misfortune, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given burial to Gracchus and Marcus yea, to all the Roman Generals, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seem, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weal: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civil, and less prone to the infidelity of revenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terror of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which passed, to make a deep impression of fear into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himself, being over-joyed with the greatness of his prosperity. For it was the battle of Metaurus that weighed down the balances, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebb, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within its banks. Hannibal having lost in this unhappy right (besides the worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that he for long fulfilled him in Italy, withdrew himself into the Country of the Bruttians: and thither he caused all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend so many places, as he held at the present, because they lay too far asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compass, in the utmost corner of Italy, it being a country of much fertility, and the people exceedingly devoted to his service. In this business Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, having all his forces united; or because it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harvest was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Consul, tarried among the Cisalpine Gauls until the end of summer; there to set things in such order, as he thought requisite; which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause he desired leave to return home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well understood his meaning: which was to have the honour of triumph, as he well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well known, what interest Nero had in the late victory: order was to given, that not only Livie with his Army should come home; but likewise Nero, though leaving his Army behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp wherof, Livie made the greater show, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers: because in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Army also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horseback, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly ascribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Venturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgment of their good service. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls; and Consuls they were chosen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this year, which was the thirteenth of this present war, until the eighteenth year wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; save only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer; and the Romans had little mind to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruin, yet in him alone, they thought there was force enough to hold himself upright. And surely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polypius, whom Livie therein follows. That making war upon a People, of all other the most war-like, he obtained so many victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of so many sundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians and Greeks, which were neither in Language, Laws, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they never fell to sedition among themselves, or against their General. But that which Livie adds here, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he finished his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry soil of the Bruttians: which when it was best maw-like, in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It's therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and virtue, he kept his Army in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatness of reward and booty; since after the death of Afrdubal, he made no invasion upon the wealthier parts of Italy, but held himself still among the poor Bruttians. Where we must leave him's until he be drawn into Africa by Scipio; whose doing will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

SECT. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spain.

t. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

Mago and Afrdubal the son of Gesce, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Afrdubal the Son of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levy a supply of men; and Afrdubal withdraw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his business, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately been employed in Sicily) who brought new forces out of Africa; and came to succeed in place of Afrdubal the Barchino. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needful from Carthage: when this Son of Amilcar, whose authority had been great, was thence departed. For hereby might the famous diligence of old Hanno approve it self, against that noble race of Warriors: when it should appear, that things did prosper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over; Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set upon the Romans. So he entered into the country of the Celiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by money, and over-persuasions, he levied above nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himself in the Eastern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may seem to the proceedings of Afrdubal, the son of Amilcar; against whom he is reported by some Writers to have sent part of his forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nere, and M. Livius the Consuls. But hearing of the levy made by Hanno and Mago among the Celiberians, he sent M. Syllanus the Pro-prefor, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitive Celiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrymen incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew near to these Celiberians: and falling upon them on the sudden, gave them such an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their succour, instead of heartening and re-inforcing them, became partakers of the loss. Mago saved himself with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten days journey, brought them safe to Afrdubal. The rest of the Africans were either slain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken prisoner, though he kept himself out of the fight until all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saved most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could not otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy stood, by the coming thither of Afrdubal. Ten thousand foot, and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors to the defence of his own Country; or was perhaps, about to send them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentive to the necessity and success of his Countrymen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spain; which must needs be alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an overthrow. The Spanish Soldiers that served under Hannibal, and those that had been sent over into Africa, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, that all which hath followed Afrdubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Army was closed up in a straight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly beehove the Spaniards to conform themselves unto the will of the Victors.

Ators. That it was the success of things in Italy, which gave such confidence unto Scipio; it was the more probable, because he took not this great enterprise in hand, until the Summer was almost spent. Afrdubal therefore used the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Army into many Garrisons, hindered the Enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, caused Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by assault the Town of Oringis.

Against the next years danger, Afrdubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor travel, in strengthening himself, for the trial of his last fortune in Spain. With seventy thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I believe, that he could hardly have raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with such a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needful to use the help of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries, made him on the other side very doubtful of relying upon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest need. Yet since one Colebus, that was Lord of eight and twenty Towns, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his service: he resolved to make use of those; and some few others, that might help to make a show, and yet not be able to do any great harm, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he fought out the Enemy; near unto whom he incamped. At this first coming, Mago and Massinissa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilst he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain Troops of Horse in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betook themselves to plain flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmishes between the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Afrdubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many days: Afrdubal being still the first that issued forth in the morning; and the first that, in the evening, withdrew himself into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at distance, many days together: it grew to be the common opinion; that they should shortly meet in the same form, and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before designed. But Scipio, when he purposed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He caused his men and horses to be well fed before in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to train out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: using herein the same trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his Father in the battle of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battle. Afrdubal sent forth his horse in all haste, to entertain the Romans; whilst he himself arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the skirmishes of the horse it could not be discerned which part had the better: since, being over-pressed on either side, they had a safe retreat unto their foot; and one troop succeeding another by course, returned to charge. This fight was portrayed by Scipio to a great length: because his men, having well fed themselves, were like to hold out better than the enemy. But about noon he caused his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battle of Spaniards far behind them, that came on suddenly, according to direction. The Spanish Mercenaries that stood in Afrdubal his wings, were no way comparable, save only in number, to the Latine and Roman Soldiers that came against them; for they were fresh Soldiers, levied in haste; and fighting only in respect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the same time, by the Roman Veltari, and by some cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the same purpose, they were sorely pressed, and with much difficulty made retreat. The Carthaginians would fain have succoured them; but that they durst not stir out of their places, because of the Spanish battle which was coming against them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the best part of Afrdubal his Army stood idle, until the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he must have cast himself into the open place that lay before him between the Roman wings: to the depth whereof, when he had arrived, he should have found himself inclosed in such sort, as was the Consul Paulus at the battle of Cannae. Wherefore he did only employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled as their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or those perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In process of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreshed their bodies in the morning, endured lustily; when the others began to faint with travel and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed the more hotly; and gave not over till they had forced the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Afrdubal did his best to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward again to have caused his men to turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them: neither was it easy to purchase courage into the vanquished, led by the oblate passion of fear, which hearkens to no persuasion. The Camp of Afrdubal had that day been taken, if a storm of rain, which fell violently on the sudden, and bred some confusion in the Romans, had not caused them to give over.

The same night Afrdubal gave no rest to his men; but caused them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the Camp; wherein he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he have in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish soldiers. One Atanes, that was Lord of the Turdani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his Subjects: many followed this example; and soon after two strong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garrisons betrayed. It seems that the perverse fortune of this late battle, whereupon Afrubal had set his rest, lived in the Spaniards a disposition, to believe the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Afrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himself, and marched away after then ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them to often to make found, that they were at last attacked by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruel slaughter: for there was no refuge made, but all fell to rout, save only seven thousand, that, with Afrubal himself recovered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in haste. The place he made shift to those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he resolved to make shift for one, and healing from his Company by night away to the Sea side, that was not far thence, he took shippings and set sail for Gades. When Scipio understood that Afrubal was thus gone, he left Syllus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to besiege their Camp, which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Massinissa lay'd it; whilst he took the rest of the Army did what was useful in the Country abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Massinissa followed Afrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it self, some flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they like. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Illurgi, Castulo, and Asapa, that made continuation of war against the Romans: of which only Castulo had a Carthaginian Garrison, consisting of such as had saved themselves by flight in the late overthrow. Hereby it seems that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yielded long since unto the Romans; though Hamul took a wife in that City. For this was one of the last three towns that held out to the Carthaginians side. Illurgi had sometimes been inclinable to the Romans, if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipios, following too carelessly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and flew the poor men that escaped thence from the overthrows. Asapa was a Town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thence by the spoil of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not until the next year) Scipio went against these, and took himself Illurgi and Castulo: Illurgi by assault, and with a general slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by reason of one Credubalar. Asapa was taken by Lucius Marcius, or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market place, whereunto was thrown all the gold, and silver, with whatsoever else was precious: the women and children standing by it under a sure guard, that should kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This provision being made, and all the Inhabitants that could bear Arms, rushed forth desperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where striving beyond their power, they were every one slain. Then was the Town forthwith set on fire, by those that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flames, whilst they rushed over-hastily to catch the gold and silver, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Afrubal being beaten into the Island of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax, King of the Masæsis, a people of the Nuimidian; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings Port, as it were landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith betwix himself, how to finish the war, by putting them to the like distress in Africa. Hereunto it seemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement, of which in all likelihood he might easily be moved to seek revenge. He had also been beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him over a Captain into Africa, who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon these reasons, the Nuimidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the City in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africa, upon the friendship of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent over C. Lælius his Embassador to deal with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to do in Spain, easily persuaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested that the Roman General should visit him in person, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereo Scipio condescended, thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far distant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquagena Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time with Afrubal. This would have been very dangerous unto him, had he been decyved by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbore to make offer one upon another. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captains of two most powerful Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: But the Romans excused himself, by want of such Commission from the Senate. He feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entered into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily broke,

Funeral games held by Scipio. A Duel between two Spanish Princes. A digression concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spain, and resting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon those of Illurgi, Castulo, and Asapa, as hath been said before. The conquest of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vows that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funeral games, especially of those that fought at sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needful that he should trouble himself with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were now, that either offered, themselves as Voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give proof in single combat, of the valour that was in their several Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to defer the decision of their Controversies, to trial of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbin and Orfisa; Colen-gewans; that contended for the principality of a Town called Beta. Corbin was the younger, and the elder brothers long before he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Lampshire. But the father of Orfisa took lately seized of the principality: which though himself received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his Son would not let it go back, but claimed to hold it as heir unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, that all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vain, to take up their quarrels; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battle, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skillful at his weapon, easily vanquished the fool-hardiness of the younger.

Such combats have been very ancient and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the War of Troy; by Thesius, Heracles, Peleus, and others: as also of two more at the War of Troy, the one between Pentarus and Menelaus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrews: whereof that between David and Goliath; and others performed by some of David's Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kind appertain the fight between twelve of the Tribes of Juda, and as many of the Benjaminites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren the Curatii, that were the Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after: of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of less importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Cannus the Dane, for no less matter than the Kingdom. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mumfry, against the Earl of Blois, contending for the Duchy of Britany; there was a fight for honour of the Nations, between thirty of the Britans, and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverley, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Kewley is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of gayete de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of several Nations: for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else occasion unto men, desirous to fight out themselves. But besides those of this fort, there are two other natures of combats which are, either upon accusation for life, or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kind, was that, of which we speak even now, between Corbin and Orfisa. Unto these (methinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; such as were that between David and Goliath, and that between the Horatii and Curatii, in which without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Brabant Duke of Herser, and Mowbray Duke of Notfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ashley and one Cattringer: whom Ashley charged with treason: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mumfry and Henry Essex. The like also, between a Navarrois, and one Wells of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had betrayed him; and was therefore drawn and hanged.

Whether our trial by battle to determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had been due to the offender, if the accusation had been proved, I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or according to the customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, he shall suffer the pains appointed for those crimes. In combats for trial of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Parsons and Laur, or offered to do, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten or yieldeth, loseth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats upon accusation, or trial of right, fought in open field, as are those of bravery; but in Camp clost, that is, within rails. Now this trial by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the fair his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Ecclesiastical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his own Jurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their proficiency thereby. For in the Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties should pay two shillings six pence; but if desist, or if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelve shillings.

And

And upon this custom grew the French Proverb, which they use when any man hath had an hard and unjust judgement; saying, That He was tryed by the Law of Lory or Berne; ou le battit oye l'amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence.

Of the the frequent trials by battle that great learned man Ivo, Bishop of Chartres did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men; as appears by His Letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch-bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein in he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kind of trial, was retrencht by S. Lewis, and Philip le fair, so that no man could decree or grant it, save the King himself. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French King, as to the Lord of Carregues, against Jacques le Gris, and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro his country-man; wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Robert now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chabli. Now in these challenges, upon accusation of Treason, Murder, other offences deserving death (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur s'oit tenu de proposer ses defences par un dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuser the Lye: otherwise it was concluded, that the defendant did taffablement confesser le crime; silently confess the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, upon some dispute about breach of Faith, had lent the Lye unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to personal combats; every petty companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giving of the Lye mortality it self; holding it a matter of no small glory, to have it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles V. had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of those occasions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryal of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half so many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter seeming worthy of anger, in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein every man takes unto himself a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personal combats, the giving of the Lye, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, become the most fruitful root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word of terrible, and a wrong to unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the fashion, taken up in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a custom: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philosophy of quarrel; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are reduced. Yea, there are (among many no less ridiculous) some of mystical curiosities herein, as that it is held a far greater dishonour, to receive from an enemy a flight thought with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword; the one having relation to a slave, the other to a soldier. I confess that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly have made with him such an exchange; and and have given him the point of honour to boot.

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lye; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that give it them; use nothing so much in their conversation and course of life, as to speak and behave falsely. Yea, it is thereby, that they blurt and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, having assumed and sworn to pay the moneys, and other things they borrow, do not break their word and promise, as often as they engage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lysers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Justice, upon breach of word or Bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of love that men make now a daies? What is the vowling of their service, and of all they have, used in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid not good morning, or salute, other than a courteous and Court-like kind of lying? It is (saith a wise French man, deriding therein the Apish custom of his Country) un marche & complot fait ensemble, le maquer, mentar, & piper les uns les autres; A kind of merchandize, and compleat made among them, to mock, boyle, and deride each other: and so far now-adaies in fashion, and in use; as he that uteth it not, is accounted either dull or Cynical. True it is not withstanding, committing the old distinction; that there is great difference between these mannerly and complementary lies, with those which are sometimes swayed by necessity upon breach of promise; and those which men use out of cowardize and fear: the latter confelling themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other filled the most villainous. But now for the Lye it self, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrels in effect; to it I say, That whosoever giveth another man the Lye, when it is manifest that he hath lyed, doth himself no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more heinously taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promitteth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he had made himself a Lyar. On the other side, He that gives any man the Lye, when he himself knows, that he, to whom it is given, hath not lyed; doth therein give the Lye directly to himself. And what cause have I, if I say that the Sun shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lye, for it's midnight, to prosecute such an one to death, for making himself a foolish Ruffian and a lyar in his own knowledge? For he that gives the Lye in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreme rudeness to tax any man in publick with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to this prejudice against whom the untruth is uttered:) But all that is rude, ought not to be civilized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French custom, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsel of God. But you will say, that these discourses favour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to fear God or hell: whereas he that is truly wife, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall find ten thousand seven penny-men (I was at that price in the wars) that fear it as little, or perchance less, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentius in intel. sui Fortitudinis Fortitudo est a diligens professor of it self. It is faith Arthole a modiciority between doubting and daring. Sic non Martyrem penas fac nec fortem pingu, sed causa: As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man: but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoever shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit; in defence of his Prince, Religion or Country: as he may justly be numbered among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devil. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or punish the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our own consciences; Animas in vulnere ponere; And to draw our souls in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will again ask me, if I condemn, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honours, being prest With injuries? I say that I do not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternal Law; and the Laws of all Christian Kingdoms and States; doth out him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the assaillant. You will secondly ask me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to satisfy the challenger in private combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour. The Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can destroy it; except you will file choise Acts honourable, where the Hang-men give the Garland. For, seeing the Laws of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror, and the Laws of God appointed the Devil to second the Conquered, dying in malice: I say, that he is both base and a foul, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this, perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, have seldom taken any such advantage over men of quality, who upon even terms have slain their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and convulsion they have not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, sue unto the King, to approve themselves by battle and publick combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; so did they disdain to submit themselves unto the shameful revenge thereof, the same revenge (because it detecteth murder) that hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Thieves: Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: yet it is not the manly-tyer freed from his pardon. For these two remedies hath the party enjoyed notwithstanding; that is, to require justice by grand Assize, or by battle, upon his appeal, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied, and he further faith (for I use his own words) That if the Defendant (for wit, the manlayer) be convinced either by great

Assize or by Battle, upon that appeal; the manlayer shall die notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So favourable (saith the famous learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realm, to justice and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noblemen and Gentlemen shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, without taking the least either in words or blows shall lay on them an injury unsufferable: I say, that a Marshals Court will satisfy satisfaction in both. And if we hold it to digress to submit our selves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands; and for all things else by which the lives of our selves, our wives, and children, are sustained, to the Judges of the Law; because it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our own: why should we not submit our selves unto the Judges of honour in cases of honour; because to recover our reputation by their hand, may be murder? But yet again it may be objected, that the loss of honour ought to be much more fearful unto us, than either the loss of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives, and I say to you. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be so dear unto us: other than a kind of History, or fame following actions of virtue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publick good? In which, he that is employed and trusted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardice, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of virtue, because it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult, because even and equal persons and arms: neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; because the loss or mutilation of an able man, is also a loss to the Commonwealth.

Now that a Marshal of England hath power to fave every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may sustain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For to report us of any evil words that we have given, and to confest that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as may fall out, is more than sufficient. For he that gives ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repent himself of them upon advisement hath the disadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blows, which are in deed not to be given but to those that are ferile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appear by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Montfieur de Pléffis, that was stricken not long since by a Baron of the same name. The satisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Constable and Marshals of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gave judgement, M. de Pléffis was set in a chair under the degrees where the Constable and Marshals are: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a Sword, with the point towards himself, and in his left hand the like cudgel or battlement, wherewith he had stricken M. de Pléffis, both which weapons he delivered into Pléffis's hands, submitting himself to such revenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshals having formerly left it to the will of Pléffis, to use his own discretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himself, or one before-hand in what he thought to do, who struck Ma de Piffie like a Russian coming behind him, and having the advantage of company, and his horses ready, shifted himself away on the sudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himself in this shameful manner: or whether Ma de Piffie (of whose valour no man doubted) had not far juster cause to be satisfied, if he might at his pleasure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wife man judge. To this, if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary: and therefore no disgrace unto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Thief, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no grace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sins to God) makes all repentance shameful: because all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for somewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it self, as it hath relation to men, either either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgment of our own weakness. Certainly as wife men, and valiant men, do rather desire petty injuries to our sudden injuries, that are not offered from malice-for thought, than revenge them: so men, apt to quarrel, do commonly suspect their own valour; a smothered desire that thereby the world should believe them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knows himself indeed to be an honest man, fears to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshals of France have, hath also a Marshal of England, or his Deputies: by whose judgement, in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preserved. We may therefore as well submit our selves to the Judge of honour, in all disputes of honour, as we do submit our selves in all controversies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Chevalry in England, in France, and elsewhere: was no less charitable than politic. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth hony-bees as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers, or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Revenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten up of several nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God upon supercilious Governours, than the permission.

His Majesty therefore (which Henry the IV. of France also endeavoured) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his predecessors could never do: in beating down, and extinguishing that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cause to hope, that his Royal care shall be no less happy in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outrageous vanity of Duellists.

Unto this I have spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great latitude, and worthy of reproof and vengeance proportionally, more or less, in their several degrees. There is much difference between Lies of necessity upon breach of promise, or complemental lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardice, or are uttered by false witnesses: the former sort being excusable by weakness or levity; the latter being altogether detestable. No less, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dole per insidias through our Laws do not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forbidding his own privilege, commandeth that the guiltful murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is every guiltful murder performed by the Sword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guiltful murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, between coming presumptuously upon a man, to fly him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cause, upon hope of spoil, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the Birds. Francis the first, Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majesty now reigning, have given notable testimony of their justice, upon these Noble men, who committed crafty murder. Of the first kind, King Francis upon the Lord of Taland: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & support de plusieurs grandes alliances; robe being of high and ancient lineage, and supported by diverse great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in especial favour with the King) was one; was notwithstanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. St. Mary, upon a Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very dear unto her, His Majestie, upon a Baron of Scotland, whose house was no less ancient and faithful, than himself valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guiltfully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artificians, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guiltfully by the pen (that I may not speak of any English Judge) the French Recherchee gives us two notable instances: the one of des Elzars, who (saith Pasquier) fit mourir Montaigne grand Ministre de France, pour contenter l'opinion celay dont il estoit Vers idolâtre, & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & étranglé. Who caused Montaigne great Minister of France to die to content his mind (To wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Elzars worshipped in his Idol; but God permitted, that he himself was soon after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who to falsifie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admiral Chabot; a man most nobly defended, and of great service. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of love grows old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with some offences, which he had formerly committed: The Admiral pleading upon the great good service which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marselles against the Emperor, gave the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publick trial. Hereupon the King (it being ease to provoke an ill disposition) gave

Com-

Commision to the Chancellor, as President, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings Advocate, to question the Admirals life: The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large confidence, (which is not rare in men towards the law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Judges with so great cunning; with others with so sharp threats; and with the rest, with so fair promises; as albeit nothing could be proved against the Admiral, worthy of the Kings displeasure, yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Liberty, though not able to prevail against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falsehood in so great a Magistrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle les os certes (saith Pasquier) a tant Juge par de-meurer toujours en soy, & ne laisser studier sa conscience devant les vagues d'une imaginaire faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le submerge, & fait Lessor à all Judges, to dwell always in themselves, and not to finish their consciences to float upon the waves of times, vagues, which in the end overthrow them. And as for the Admiral, though it might have been answered unto his friends, if any bewail his calamity as undeserved, That he was tried, according to his own desire, by the Laws of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings justice, furnishing all other his passions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Estate.

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spain, His return to Rome, where he is chosen Consul.

THE last business that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sick, in such sort that the rumour of his death, ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take Arms against the Romans. They were vainly persuaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spain. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatness of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they rashly fell upon the Suffetans and Sedetans, confederates of the Romans; and waited till the Country. Part of the Roman Army lay at Suro, instead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be afflicted with the like distemper. They had not rapt such profit of the Roman Conquests, as might falsifie their desires; or as they thought, ease to be gotten, if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought that the time served very well to enrich themselves with the spoil of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonels, that should have bruled their fury; they chose out of their own number two bad fellows, Albitus Calenus, and Atrius Umbro, to their Commanders. These took upon them all the Ensigns of Pro-consuls, or Pro-pretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was chosen by the Souldiers after the death of the two Scipios: But whilst they were devising what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion as was expected, there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came also new Colonels, sent unto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to be glad that they had no further over-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to do exemplary justice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deserved. Therefore he caused Syllanus to make ready their Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an expedition against Mandonius and Indibilis: he caused Albitus and Atrius, with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings: he called the Mutineers to assembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inveighed against them all as Traitors. This done, Albitus and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake, where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman custom toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was sworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in arms: notwithstanding that they had certain word of Scipio's life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the severity used to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them, and found them in a valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and finding Latinus with all his horse, to fetch a compass about the hills, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius after this, no hope remaining to preserve themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himself and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves less free Princes than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masaniassa; who secretly promised to do him all service, if the people of Rome would lend him to make war in Africa. Anto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spain alone, he should thence depart from his Fleet, into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gauls and Ligurians, to join with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent unto him from Carthage; and he himself laid hold upon all that he could find in the Town of Gades; without sparing either private men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In this voyage thence, he landed at Carthage; hoping to have taken it by surprise. But he failed in the attempt, and was fo beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himself a while at Gades. The Gaditanians, offended with the robberies and spoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would would not suffer him again to enter into their City. By this he forsook, that it would not be long ere they became Romans. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth unto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succour him therein: and himself with ten ships returned home. At his coming to Rome, he made suit for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet been granted unto no Pro-consul, excepting to such, as received that dignity after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse, the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by general voice of the City, P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul, and P. Licinius Crassus joined with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Roman, might not by the custom of those times, go far from the City: as being to attend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same office, were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being far and long absent. Hecy it came to pass, that Scipio, desiring to have the war transferred into Africa, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the division of Provinces; for that his Collegue was not capable of employment to far off.

SECT. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leave to make war in Africa. His preparations. Of Masanißa who was joined with Scipio. The victories against Aldrubal and Syphax.

PUb. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: where it was decreed, that Scipio should be allowed, to bestow part of the money which he had brought out of Spain into the treasury; upon the setting forth of solemn plays, that he had vowed to make whilst he was busied in his Spanish wars. This helped well to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he intended to make in Africa. To the same purpose, did the Spanish Embassadors avail much in the Senate: especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deservedly; saying, that they were the most happy of all their Countrymen, since they being present, had seen him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyful news. The Saguntine Embassadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate: as their faith to Rome (though costly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deserved. Nevertheless, when Scipio propounded, that Africa might be decreed unto him for his Province, there wanted not many, even of the principal men, that vehemently gained him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who seems to have been troubled with that disease, which too often caused men, renowned for long approved virtue, to look askant upon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kind. He alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chief were, that the Treasury was unable to sustain the charges of a war in Africa; and that it was extremely perilous to hazard for great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled unto the defence of Rome if self, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his Brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Africa. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spanish wars, as of less moment than the intended voyage against Carthage, nor to withhold to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having suffered Afrubal to pass into Italy: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithstanding the good success of Scipio, (if it happened to be good) might be sent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, that neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africa to be that year a Province; which the Consul nevertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted upon this one point; that it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive war, especially against such as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves, by help of money, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Collegue, would be as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africa, for defence of his own home; and taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise, he propounded the matter again to the Senate. Much alterations there was about the manner of his proceeding: forasmuch as it was noised abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the ancients: who retired in this honourable man, a little piece of that arrogance, which in following ages grew to be much more, in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himself wholly to the Senate good will and pleasure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicily might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to pass over into Africa, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furnish out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africa. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the sudden from the Baleares to Gemma, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no less terrible invasion upon Italy, than that which Afrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Army of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with civil wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his party; and to help those whom he thought fittest for his turn, against the others. This troublesome business, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have spared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the untidy Gauls ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that under Pro-consuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need should require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardy and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aid from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is uncertain) laden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much disabuse him: and though after a while there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartening him in his proceedings; yet those impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into Africa, disturbed all; and made him be so-called home.

Against Hannibal was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians have been pleased to take notice. Only it is said, that he spent his Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punic and Greek Letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamblers that are at the height of their fortune, yet come upon remission and carelessness: in those that are upon the losing hand, a cause both of the fame for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great pestilence infested both the Carthaginian and the Roman Camp, is said to have been the occasion of this years idleness; which fell out not much amiss for the City of Rome, that was marvelously impoverished by this war; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieve the present necessity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no loss, the tenth part of the fine was ordained, as a reward unto the detectors of Lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make presents of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is usually found in Councils of estate, that the buff, or obdurate heads of a few do carry all the business, and many times men make a surrender of their own judgments, to the wisdom, that hath gotten it self a name, by giving happy direction in troubles foreseen. Therefore, he that reposeth himself upon the advice of many, shall often find himself deceived: the counsel of those many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-weigh the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature fortified well with the business, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered; with others of the Senators, that were grown old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of time required. But the People (who though they could not well advise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needful resolution of Scipio: in such fort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about seven thousand Voluntaries. He had also provision from the feveral Towns: Corn, Iron, Canvas for Sails, Axes, Beed-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements; Fire for building of Ships, many thousands of Tarrets, Helmets and Spears of all kinds: every place furnished him with that commodity, which it best could afford.

Unto this willingness of the people, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compass of five and forty days he had both felled his Timber, built, and lanced twenty Triemes, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Army into Sicily. In Sicily he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had served at Cannæ: where were old Souldiers, and (as he himself well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy sentence. They had served under Marcus and Levins, at the taking of many Cities and strong places: in which regard, they were like to be of good use to him in Africa, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilian all wealthy young men, and such as loved well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the War, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliver their Horse and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpose. Whilst he was providing to have things a readiness for Africa, the banished Locrians, that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, wherewith they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Leori, (for there were two in the Town) being taken prisoners for the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed and rewarded. Scipio being adverted of this, gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded, and that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aid. The Romans in like fort, fearing lest their paucity should make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Consul Scipio. The Towns-men were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the coming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in the custody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate: not only against those of the Garrison: but much more against Fleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctity, was spoiled by these barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore advised the Senate to make present amends to the Goddels for this sacrilege: saying, that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done unto them: sent for Fleminius, with other principal offenders: whom they cast into prison, and used according to their deserts: as also they restored unto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not therewithal contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Leori; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to run on in these his wicked courses. By the sharp invective that Paius made, others took courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demourour of Scipio, as against the dissoluteness of his Army: which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindful of any service toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so far urged, that ten Legates were sent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Island; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they feared him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lelius in Africk; rather to make discovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great booty: and struck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who saw their affairs to be upon terms of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masaniissa, he well informed himself of the state of Africk, and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to join with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masaniissa's revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made underneath with the Romans, Livie does not profess that there was no such evident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancy in following times, must help to prove, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian far inferior to Livie, both in worth and time) gives one reason for probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Only the doubt is, How could it any way come to pass, that the knowledge of such a matter should have escaped the diligence of Livie if it had been true: unless we should believe, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedy; the sorrow whereof would cause men to think amiss of Scipio. Howsoever it was thus Appian tells it: and many circumstances of things do hence confirm it. Ardubal, the Son of Alexas, Gefco, had a fair Daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masaniissa loved. Masaniissa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withal a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Ardubal to be his Son-in-law. When the Virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great Service. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Ardubal's Daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her upon Syphax, without standing to acquaint her Father or Masaniissa therewithall: This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masaniissa was advertised; and forthwith entered into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he thought; yet not so secretly, but some notice was taken of it: which would have cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conveyed himself home, into his Fathers Kingdom. Thus far forth we may believe Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seems, that howsoever Sophonisba, the Daughter of Ardubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet since this their courtship proceeded from fear, he thought it wisdom to continue and increase the fame their fear, by making fair promises to the Romans, until Ardubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it self, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Tolypius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Masaniissa was the Son of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose Father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Deisates the Brother, not unto Masaniissa the Son. But this Uncle of Masaniissa shortly died: and his elder Son, who took possession of the Kingdom, was vanquished, and slain in a battle by a Rebel, that made himself Protector over the younger, which was a child. The Traitor fortified himself against Masaniissa, whose return he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupil, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masaniissa: that was a skillful Warrior, and well beloved for the memory of his Father Gala. The Carthaginians, in reason would have been glad, that Masaniissa, who had done them notable Service, was thus confirmed in his Estate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whilst his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corvival, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drove him out of his Kingdom. Nevertheless, Masaniissa still retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained strong enough to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distress, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrty, between the borders of the Carthaginians, and the Nation of the Garamans, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as Hippo; and when Lelius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to listen on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aid and succour was repoled more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poor Masaniissa, sent an Embassy into Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chuse but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheless, he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For the promised alliance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardness of many adventurers. Left therefore the failing of this hope, should work too great a change in common opinion. He thought it the best way to prevent all discourse, and let the war undertaken, immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in haste, with Letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what he had promised, he had had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make it good. Having sent them away, he called his Soldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which he intended no longer to defer. For, said he, Masaniissa hath been with Lelius; and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondering upon what I should thus stay, and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syracusæ. And left any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his Beec unto Lylibæum: and requested by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; halted thither with his Army. Lylibæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them, which to leave behind for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needless to set them down, since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occasions, have omitted; they being also word for word set down by an Historian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, near to a forehead then called the fair Promontory: which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compass, I cannot precisely affirm; because it is uncertain, whether it were the Cape or Headland which bore the name of Mercury, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northwesterly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masaniissa unto Scipio at his first arrival, helped to confirm the opinion of Xylander, who thinks the fair Promontory to have been the same, that was also called Mercurius Cape, since with little difficulty Masaniissa might come thither from the lesser Syrty, whereabout was his common abiding. But for as much as without any memorable impediment soon after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Utica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seem, that he landed within the Promontory of Apollo; whence the way to Utica was no long. This is also strongly proved; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, five hundred horse to trouble him in his discomfiting. Neither was it so hard for Masaniissa, that roved about the Country with a troop of horse, to find out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he usually resorted, like as before he had met with Lelius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army and Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compass to Utica, by Land; when he might have disembarked nearer unto it. Nevertheless it may pass as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporis, a plentiful Region about the lesser Syrty; since he gave charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lylibæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Country there-about was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masaniissa had signified unto Lelius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoever they made brave promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head, but when he saw their Fleet and Army, so be such, as not only served to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatened a conquest of the City and whole Estate: then might he better advise them to let fall for Utica, and make War upon the Enemies at their own doors.

The Carthaginian had at that time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Soldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haste. Ardubal the son of Gefco, the same that had lately been chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was; or if ought were wanting in him, yet this Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passable. He was then with the King his son-in-law, working him no doubt against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invasion: entreating the one of them to give assistance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was chosen General. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troop of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the City to disturb his landings; and slain Hanno, a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other booty, he took eight thousand prisoners; all which he conveyed aboard his Hulks or Ships of burden, and sent them back laden into Sicil. He took likewise a Town called Salera which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thousand Numidian horse: whose service being fitter, for the field, than for defence of walled places, was sent Scipio to perceive the unskillfulness of their Leader, that had thus humbled them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the imprudent Hanno so far, that he drew him into a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was easily gotten, and Hanno either taken or slain. With those that fled, the Romans entered pell-mell into the Town, which presently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath been formerly made, and fate down before it, Forty days he spent about it, affailing it both by Land and Sea, and using all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty; yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to choose a place, and fortify his Winter Camp, which must be well fortified against the year following. Whilst thus necessity urged him to leave Utica, and shame of taking his repulse in his first great enterprise, rather than hope of any better success, caused him to stay there: Ardubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the siege. Ardubal had made a levy of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse: yet adventured not with his ill-trained Army to draw near to the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: which joyning unto the Forces of Afdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occasion to dislodge. He chose for his Winter-Camp the banks of an In-let, that had good harbour for his Navy. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joyning to the continent by an arm of Land: his horse-men he bestowed upon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottom of the Creek he moored his ships and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole camp he strongly fortified, and so attended the season of the year, when it should serve him again to fight. Of cattle and other booty Mafiniffa had brought in great store, by driving the Country, before the coming of Afdrubal and Syphax. Corn he had also gotten some: and great store was sent from Socil and Sardinia. Likewise apparel for his Soldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serve turn, for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his booty, as he could best spare: especially with captives to be sold for slaves. Afdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the favour of situation, which the Romans used in the discipline of war, or for that they presumed upon their multitude, against which they trusted in Scipio no disposition to ill-use, forth of his strength, and might. So the Winter passed without action.

When Spring drew near, Scipio thought it good to assay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by persuasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally unconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, that having wearied himself by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp; and being peradventure no less weary with fatigues of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this war: he might be moved with a little entreaty to withdraw himself home, into his Kingdom, and rest a Natter. But it is not unlikely, that such a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had been invited, to make a step thither and repose himself a while: his wife Queen Sophoniba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. However it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reasonable. That Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africa, and so make an end of the war: whereupon now both Africa and Europe were disquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at first give ear: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the intercourse of Embassadors, he began to make them, as if he would consider of the motion. He was given to understand by those whom he had sent unto the King, that the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, used coverings, Mats and Reeds: others that came later, had thatched their lodging with dry boughs and leaves: under which they lay carefully without their Trenches. Upon this advertisement he bethought himself, That it would not be hard for him to let their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without help of some such stratagem, he foresaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wars when time should serve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse, which upon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter, the more needful he found it for himself, to make sudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he sent many Embassadors, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpose to discover all that might concern the intended surpris. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Soldiers disguised like slaves: that wandering (as it were) idle up and down in the Camp, might observe the ways and entrances, with whatsoever else was needful. When he had learned as much as he desired, upon the sudden he first went to Syphax: that it was vain to hold any longer treaty, so far as he could not get the consent of his Council of war; without whose approbation, all that himself could do, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his design in execution. The True being thus cut off, Afdrubal and Syphax were very perfidious: as having lately persuaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to devise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp, and provoke him to battle in those Plains. Thus if they could do, they hoped to make his Council of war repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did Marcus Attilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? Which they themselves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian Fleet should do by Sea: that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves: the Enemy might suspect the loss of their hopes; with that the Victors to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger, but continued in the fire negligence, which was grown upon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to do somewhat against Vicia. Two thousand Soldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same piece of ground, whereon he lay against Vicia before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, left being suspected by his own Soldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it, partly to hinder those who from letting upon the few, that he purposed to leave behind him in his Camp. He caused his men that night to slip well, and betimes that they might be ready for the journey. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Camps: all the rest of the Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seven miles and an half: whom he purposed to undertake himself with the one half of his Army: the other half he committed to Leilus and Mafiniffa, whom he sent before him to sit upon the camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the

the Camp of Syphax should be on a light fire, & he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seem to have taken by casualty upon the Numidians that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Afdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and give Syphax warning to look to himself. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and softly: that Leilus and Mafiniffa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compass about for fear of being discovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three a clock in the morning, when the camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himself, imputed unto casualty; as thinking themselves safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to do, some flaring half a sleep; and others that had fallen up late at drinking, run out of their Cabins to quench the fire. But to great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly understand in what case they were, nor give any remedy to the mischance as it was supposed. Many were smothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater, many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the sudden mischief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the fire, fell upon the enemies sword, which was ready to receive them. Especially Mafiniffa that best knew the Country, did great execution upon them: having laid all the ways; by which he foresaw that they would seek to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pitiful mischance: so that some ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would serve to quench the fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where fearless of any danger toward themselves, they stood beholding the greatness of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore lost no time: but setting upon those that were running towards the Numidians, he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their camp, which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Afdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but flitted only for himself, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barthine faction, had been taken in such a manner: it is more than probable that old Fama would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been said, that with less than one half of 30000. men, he might at least have given some bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling these fires: had he not been very careful how to save his own fearful head. Nevertheless Polybins acknowledged, and it is most likely to have been true, That if Afdrubal, or any of those about him, would have stricken to their valour, when the Camp was once on fire: He should not thereby have done any manner of good, because of the tumult and confusion. I shall not need to tell what a fearful thing it was, to hear the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruel flame that consumed them: which (as Polybins affirms) none that hath been is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands, very few did escape; which accompanied Afdrubal and Syphax in their several ways of flight. Besides these also there were some fugitives, especially of the Numidians, that saved themselves in the dark: but they were not many, as after shall appear. Surely it muft needs have been very hard to tell, how many were burnt, or otherwise miserably made away, and what numbers escaped in the dark of the night. Wherefore Livie who in the rest of this relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybins, may seem to have followed some less worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in casting up the sum. For he reckons only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to have escaped: forty thousand to have perished by sword or fire: and above six thousand to have been taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is far short of fourscore and thirtienthouland, which were in these two Camps. Afdrubal, putting himself into the next Town that was very strongly fortified, thought there the Romans would, and the Carthaginians at good leisure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Town; if the Town-men would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whereto were better to fight, or to yield. Unto this disputation, he well foresaw, that the arrival of Scipio would soon give an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold upon him, and seek the Victors favour by delivering him up: he struck away betimes and made all haste to Carthage. As for the town which he left: it opened the gates to Scipio at his first coming: and therefore preserved it self from all manner of loss. The two next Towns adjoining would needs be valiant, and make countenance of war: but their strength not being answerable, they were soon taken by Scipio: who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Soldiers. This being done, he returned to the siege of Vicia.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when indeed of either peace or victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard news of such a lamentable overthrow. Necessity enforced them to make busy provision for the future: but how to do it, few of them saw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others to fend for Hannibal out of Italy; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the loss of this Army, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, that they should bend all their care this way, levying in all haste another Army; and sending Embassadors to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Afdrubal the son of Gisco, was employed to make new levies: Men: and Queen Sophoniba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax, who having gathered together as many as he could of his Subjects that had escaped from the slaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdom. Sophoniba laboured to win her husband, that at length he won him to her own desire. And it fell out at the same time, that four thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to serve in Africa. Of these were made such brave reports, as if their courage, and the Arms which they used, were not to be refuted. Even the multitude within Carthage believed these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one age, the whole country of Spain had been twice conquered by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginians Embassadors helped with a lye saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty days they made up an Army, confiding well-near of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called The great Fields, about five days journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Utica thither, with them: leaving behind him his impediments, with some part of his Army, to make a shew of continuing the Siege. Two or three days, after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now been time for Africanus to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and seek to weary out the Enemy by delays. But either (which is likely) he was a far wiser Commander: or life it was not in his power, to give such directions as best pleased himself. The fourth day the Armies met in battle: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horse in the right wings, and Masaniissa with his Numidians on the left. On the contrary side, Africanus and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax the left; and the Spaniards, the battle. The victory was gotten without many blows: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Africanus, could not sustain the first charge of the Italians, or of Masaniissa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even until they were all in a manner slain: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come over to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficial to those that fled, for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Herby Africanus and Syphax escaped: Africanus to Carthage; and Syphax home to his own Kingdom: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the mastery of the Field, took counsel about the prosecution of the war. It was resolved upon as the best course, That he himself, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masaniissa, with his Numidians, and Laelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his own Kingdom, where easily else he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it seems that Masaniissa gave: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his own Kingdom, usurped by Syphax, which to accomplish, it no less concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himself. According to this order concluded, Laelius was sent away with Masaniissa: and Scipio stayed behind, carrying the War from Town to Town. Many places yielded for fear: many were taken by force; and all the Subjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those unreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid upon them, for maintenance of the war in Spain and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolve. Fortune was their enemy: they had lost their Armies, and many of their Towns; neither durst they make bold to trouble their own Subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadors should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to fit out a Fleet against that of Scipio, and rode before Utica, weakly manned, that ease to be taken, whilst Scipio himself was busied in the Island Countries. Some were of opinion, that it should be their principal care to fortify by all means the City of Carthage; upon the safety whereof they said, all depended: adding, that whilst they were true, and at unity among themselves, they might well enough submit, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtless) would preferat them. These counsels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman Fleet at Utica. Nevertheless, it was considered, that thereby they should only protract the war; without any advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the Ships at Utica might be taken, or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, that he should immediately come over into Africa, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Council was no sooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the Fortification of the Town: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embark themselves for Italy.

In this their trepidation, Scipio came to Tunes, a City in those days very strong, and standing in prospect almost of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defensible piece adjoining, he easily took; the Garrisons forsaking it, and running away, as soon as he drew near. But whilst he was about there to incamp, and fortify himself against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Utica: What this meant, he readily conceived, and stood in great fear, lest his own Ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight, (as being heavily laden with Engines of Battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assaulting the Town) should make bad resistance, against a Fleet appointed for that special Service. Wherefore he halted away towards Utica, to assist with his presence in this needful case. It fell out well, that he had sent his Carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Utica, they tarried a while to make a bravado; presenting themselves in order of battle, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bravery at Sea: it should little avail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he took his ships of burden, and fastening them together with Cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold Bridge over the Channel of the Haven: whereon he placed a thousand of his choise men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some other spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and back again upon any advantage or need: but those he covered with planks, using the Masts and Yards of his Ships instead of Rakers, to joyn all together, that his men might help one another, and the Bridge it self not be torn asunder. Scarce was this work finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The Fight between them, and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a Wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the Bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do, but the Roman Frigots and long Boats, adventuring forth from behind the Bridge, were greatly over-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small loss that followed. They that stood upon the Bridge, were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestir their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for fear of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw upon the Masts and Yards, together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder: in such sort, that one Ship followed another, and all the first rank was broken or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next rank of Ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away six Ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their welcome was greater than their victory, because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilst things thus passed about Carthage, Laelius and Masaniissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masaniissa to his Kingdom, without farther contention: the Masaniissians, his Subjects, joyfully receiving him, and forsaking the usurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Africanus and Sophoniba, he prepared again for war. But betide the indignation of his beloved wife; the loss of the Masaniissians would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Laelius and Masaniissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no less unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to think alike their own, whereof they are in possession, be the title unto some part never so unjust. Hecurto alludes the fable of the young kite, which thought that it... omitted up her own Guts, when it was only the Garbage of some other Fowl, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, believed the Kingdom of the Masaniissians to be part of his entails: Laelius and Masaniissa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him call his Gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so far. It concerned the Romans to dispossess (if it might be) the King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had been converted into strong enmity, as also to let in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masaniissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day, though there be many strong Towns, yet the fortune of a battle is enough, to translate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no less an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago sent unto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order, yet he could not teach them how to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered up in haste; and few of them had seen war before. Encamping near unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troops of Horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: so that at length Syphax, unwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foil at their first meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Masaniissa, whose numbers were far less. But whilst he was prosecuting, some hope of victory; some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their own Troops of Horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battle standing now more firm, than a little before, Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Masaniissa likewise, and his Troops grew confident upon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to give back. Herewithal the Legions came in fight: which terrified the Numidian horse, that they began presently to disband. Fain would Syphax have stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was cast from his Horse, which received a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slain or taken: the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsook the place, and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Roman hand. Masaniissa told Laelius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian war, if presently they halted away to Cirta the chief City of the Kingdom: whether he himself desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying rying Syphax along with him. Hercurto Lelius agreed. Masaniſſa coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parley; where, in by many fair promises and threats, but especially by shewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one strove to get his favour: that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yielded her self into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that the might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suit, that Masaniſſa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himself that very day; thereby to prevent Lelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since he was his wife. But Lelius, when he came thither, took the matter haينously, so that at first he would have halted her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and have sent her unto Scipio. But being over-intreated by Masaniſſa, he fulfilled the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred also to Scipio's discretion; to whom he sent away Syphax and other Captives immediately; following shortly after himself with Masaniſſa, when they had done what was needful in the Kingdom.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Africanus, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together fought his friendship; with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministering to every one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make war upon them, unprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moved him to do so; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masaniſſa was no wiser than himself, since he had now taken the same woman to his Wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perilous woman should deprive him of Masaniſſa, as he had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masaniſſa and Lelius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in public, for their notable service in this Expedition. Then taking Masaniſſa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him understand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great services already done (for which he should be highly rewarded to his own contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reason. Masaniſſa blushed, and wept: and finally promised to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheless intreated, to think upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that he should not be delivered into the Roman power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called unto him a Servant of his that had the custody of his posyion, (which Princes used then to have in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it unto her with this message: that gladly he would have her to live with him as his Wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yield thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her Birth and Estate, and accordingly to take order for her self.

At the receipt of this Message and Present, she only said; That if her Husband had not better Token to send unto his new Wife, he must accept of this; adding, That the might have dyed more honourably, if he had not Wedded so lately before her Funeral. And herewithall the boldly drank off the poison. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it down agreeably to that which hath been spoken before, concerning the pre-contract between Masaniſſa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta, met with Lelius and Masaniſſa upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace; and that Sophonisba, for her own private, sent messengers to excuse her Marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masaniſſa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to Wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was: and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masaniſſa at his return, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans; Masaniſſa said, she was his own Wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masaniſſa should keep her in possession, as long as it was disputable, unto whom the might appertain. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her, wherein he should have no wrong. Herewithall he sent to fetch her away: and Masaniſſa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the necessity, gave unto her a cup of poison, wherewith he ended her life, before they came that should have apprehended her. So he shewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he myself interred. The sudden violence of Masaniſſa's love, and the ready consent of Sophonisba to marry with him, add not so much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cause (which Livie notes) of the fudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had been trained up, and done them great Service. Howsoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, sent for Masaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could, lest his melancholly should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashness, he brought him forth in the presence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crown of Gold; with other Royal Ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the sad remembrance of that which was past, unto the more cheerful contemplation of good fortune, that began to smile upon him.

This was the first time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King, which honour though Masaniſſa well deserved; yet would not the title have redounded unto his great benefit: neither should he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered possession of his Country, together with the

the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Native in these wars, and sustained himself with his Troop of Horse, in such sort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheless have recovered his proper Inheritance, by the love of his own Subjects without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdom, it was no more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case to make a Conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than upon such a man upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured Friend, and passible withall among the Numidians as being (for the Masfayli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious; and the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their insulting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereto they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vernina the Son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speak more) which held some pieces of his Fathers Kingdom, desiring Friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of fault, yet the Roman Senate was Prædilectum herein, and answered very bravely, That it was not their custom to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in process of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings that no way depended upon them, the salutation by that name, though it were not accompanied with any other favour or profit thence redounding.

SECT. XIX.

The Carthaginians desired Truce, and break it.

THE Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good Friend Syphax, and understood that Masaniſſa their mortal enemy, had got possession of his Kingdom. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither Forces, nor Courage, to withstand him; but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the City, which were their Privy Counsel, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostitute themselves on the ground; but kissed the Feet of him, and of those that sat in Council with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a monument of their clemency; which by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadors were no Barbarians; but rather, that they were Humans, and the choice of his company, who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto them for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be, that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their own necessity, unless they themselves had expected the like, wherein they had the advantage.

It was not unknowna to Scipio, or to his Assistants, in what poor case the City of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the War. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loss of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distressed the Walls of Carthage, though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the Field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africa, to make a Conquest, and not Peace; yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the People of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making War, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed upon them, were these: That they should render up unto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegades and fugitive Slaves: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gauls: That they should not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any land between Italy and Africa; nor that they should deliver up all their Ships of War, save Twenty; and that they should pay a great sum of money, with certain hundred thousand bushels of Wheat and Barley. To consider of these Articles, he gave them three days; and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniſſa was dismissed, and went home into his Kingdom, as if the War had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lelius unto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an Holy-day appointed for Thanksgiving and Supplication to their Gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masaniſſa: who gratulating the happy success of the Romans in their African War, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto his

Maſter made request for the Numidians, ſuch as were now his Subjects and priſoners in Rome, that they might be belowed upon him, who by rendering them to liberty, ſhould do an act very pleaſurable, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reign. The Roman Senate were not behind with Majaniſſa in complement; but hewing themſelves to be highly pleaſed with all that Scipio had done, and ſhould do for him, they called him King again: releaſed his Numidians that were captives; and ſent him two purple Caffecks, that had each of them one gold button, with ſuch other preſents, as in time of their poverty might ſerve to relieve his good will. Scarcely were theſe and Lelins gone from Rome, when the news came, that Embaſſadors from Carthage were arrived to deſire peace. Theſe Embaſſadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without: untill Lelins being ſent for, came back from Oſtia, to be preſent when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona: that diſtance in the Suburbs. The errand of theſe Embaſſadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City was only to win time, and get reprieve for war; untill Hannibal and Mago ſhould come out of Italy, either to chafe the Romans out of Africa, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great Names and Armies; without more eaſe conditions. Wherefore they made an idle diſcourſe of the League, that was concluded between them and Lutitius Catulus, at the end of the former war. This League they ſaid, all things well conſidered, did ſtill remain in force: neither had there been any war at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head beſieged and razed the Town of Saguntum; and after that adventured in like fort, without Commiſſion, to paſs the Alps, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being ſo, their meſſage was none other than to deſire, that the League before ſpoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter ſtand in force; as indeed it hereto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cauſe to wonder at this tale, hearing theſe Embaſſadors make (as it were) a jeſt of war, that had been ſo terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many queſtions, concerning that peace made by Endarius, and other paſſages following between the two Cities. But they excuſed themſelves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and ſaid, that thoſe things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they fought no other than to gain time untill they might repair the war. Wherefore they were ſent home, in company of Lelins without any conſultation at all of peace, and in ſilence, without answer. This notwithstanding, we find in Polybius, that the Senate received advertisement from Scipio, of that which had paſſed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of peace; approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto Conſultation. This may with good reaſon be believed, ſince it was not unknown that if the war continued, all theſe goodly hopes mult reſult upon the moſt uncertain iſſue of one battle between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune ſhould be averse to them, their forces in Africa were no better than quite loſt.

Matters thus hanging in ſuſpence, before the

Carthaginian Embaſſadors came back from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred ſhips of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africa, to victual the Roman Camp, was over-taken by foul weather at Sea, and tardily creaking wrack, was diſperſed, and driven a-ground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which cauſed the people to cry out upon their Magiſtrates, that they ſhould not let out a booty of eaſe them, ſaying, that the danger of famine was greater and worſe, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were ſo, that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy deſires: the multitude in Carthage underſtood (as it ſeems) that all this diſcourſe of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery, and therefore cared not for obſervation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was his manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the raſcality, together with women and boys, to be meddling in upſours: the clamours of the boys being in ſuch tumults no leſs violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvel, if little regard were had of reaſon, or of honour, in any ſuch commotion. A Fleet was ſent out under Aſdrubal, to gather up the diſperſed Roman ſhips of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oars recovered the ſtation where they were adjoyned) and bring them into Carthage, which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loſs; and for that the Town was thereby relieved: but for that by this breach of Truce, he foreſaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he ſent Embaſſadors unto them, both to require ſatisfaction for the injuries done; and to deter them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had fo much delired. Theſe gave the Carthaginians to underſtand, that Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon thoſe conditions which he had propounded. But (ſay they) we hold it ſtrange, That ye, who ſo lately have caſt your ſelves to the ground before us, and killed our ſelves after an unuſual manner of humility, conſiſſing your ſelves to have perſonally broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deſerved ſuch puniſhment as is due unto Rebels, ſhould ſo ſoon forget what ye then intended, and run headlong again into the ſame crimes for which ye acknowledged your ſelves worthy to be deſtroyed, having only requeſt unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye reſpoſe in Hannibal, that is this embolden you. Yet were it not amifs, that ye ſhould conſider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner beſieged, and unable to ſtir: ſo that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greateſt need. Or let it be ſuppoſed that he were now in Africa, and ready to give us battle: yet ſhould it well agree with your wiſdom to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it ſhould happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your ſelves againſt hereafter? What good will ye either ſwear by, to be believed, or call upon in your miſery? What words, and lamentable geſture will ye henceforth uſe, to move compaſſion? Surely ye have already waſted all your force of perſwaſion, and ſhall not again deceive us, if ye reſuſe the grace, whereof at this preſent ye are capable. It is

SECT. XX.

In what fort Hannibal spent the time after the battle of Metaurus: The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversely affected by Hannibals departure.

Ever ſince the loſs of that battle at Metaurus, Hannibal remaining in the Country of the Brutians, waiting for another ſupply from Carthage. The Roman Councils that ſucceeded unto Claudius and Lutius, by whom Aſdrubal was overcome and ſlain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Lutius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthy of remembrance againſt Hannibal, being hindered by the Peliſſence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Conſul, who followed Lutius, and Gn. Servilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were carefully bent to have done ſome what: but their diligence was in a manner fruitleſs. In ſome skirmiſhes with Hannibal, they had the better; in ſome the worſe: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by ſtealth; his care being more to preſerve his Army, than to keep thoſe places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time ſo many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africa, where in they were at no ſmall charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) ſhould bring the War to a ſhort and happy conclusion. They ſtood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gauls to raiſe an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago ſolicited alſo the Hetrurians, and found them ſo ready to ſtir in his behalf, that if he could have enticed their Country ſtrong, it might have proved no leſs needful for Scipio to return home out of Africa, than ſhortly it was for Hannibal to make preſent unto the defence of Carthage. Theſe dangers cauſed the Romans to imploy one of their Conſuls or Pro-conſuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: for ſome what it was uncertain, upon which ſide Mago would break out: Being thus buſied, it was no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in ſome readineſs for his ſetting forwards, he met in the Country of the Inſubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconſul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Pretors. With theſe he fought a battle, wherein though his virtue ſhewed it ſelf worthy of his Father and Brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtful; in ſuch fort that the Roman Commanders began to diſturb the iſſue. Wherefore Quintilius the Pretor taking unto him all the Roman Horſe, thought to have ſhaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the ſame time gave a loud ſhout: and ſtrained themſelves hard, as if at that brunt the victory ſhould have been carried before them. But Mago oppoſed his Elephants to the Horſe: the ſervice of thoſe beasts being fitter for such use, than against the squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did fright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Herby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loose, than against the troops that were close and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shower of darts, and killed four of them; causing all the rest to give back. This notwithstanding the same Legions were so valiantly pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Pro-consul therefore brought up those forces, which he had kept unto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these, Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom he had in readiness for the like occasion. But the Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soon beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought fear upon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, he put himself in the head of his Army; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by force of his own men: the rest of them, after a little further resistance, provided every one for himself: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great cost: as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the loss of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætor's Army, besides those that dyed of the proconsul Legions; also besides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark that fell in this hot piece of service. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the assistance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted these valiant sons of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himself (by safe journeys, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gave him to understand the pleasure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repair home with all their forces; not staying any longer to think upon the conquest of Italy, since Carthage itself was ready to be lost. He obeyed this Commandment, and imbarqued shortly his Army; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to return into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burst out; whilst the Embassadors were delivering their errand. When their message was done: He told them, that this was yet plain dealing: For, said He, you that were directly bid me come home, have long ago done both to hale me out of Italy; though more closely and crookedly they went to work, by stopping the supply that would have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore shall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heels: it is Hanni- that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the house of the Barchinies, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruins of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleece in readiness, doubting that which after came to pass; wherein he imbarqued, besides his own men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunk back from him, and refused to do service in this expedition; of whom, such as he could take, he flew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sanctuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italy no less passionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Country to go into exile. He locked back unto the hour accusing both gods and men; cursing his own dulness; in that he had not led his Army from Carræ, hot and bloody as it was, directly unto the walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italy; wherein he had lived almost half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans, in the first beginning of this War, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertain the news of Hannibal's departure out of Italy; they would (I think) less earnestly have pressed the Carthaginians to send him over thither. When sure advertisement was brought into the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary good sacrifices publicly made, for joy of such tydings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remain the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to perform abroad in a land of strangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought unto them a great mass of Gold and Silver, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian prisoners were excepted, the treasure was rendered back unto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those moneys that had been borrowed in time of more necessity from private men. Hence also proceeded the severe chastisement laid upon those twelve Colonels, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refused to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to set out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the very utmost of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatness of their spirit) upon the good success of the battle at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nearly of that which might happen; and were informed that the terrible Army, wherof Italy had been few days since discharged, was landed life in Africk; they began to revolve a thousand fearful matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who

(who died about the same time) would be found a true Prophet. For, by thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Adribal no speciality of so great worth, as might promise the like success against another manner of General, followed by another manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a racial multitude of half-skullions, that were good for nothing; being himself a fit Captain for such Soldiers. Likewise Adribal the son of Gisco was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise, one, that in the field was only good at saving himself by a swift retreat. But now there came an Army of men hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the spoils, not only of good Soldiers, but of brave Captains, by them slain. Such talk used the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battle with many that had slain Roman Pretors, yea, and Consuls with their own hands: with many that had been first in getting over the Trenches of several Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of walls at the siege of towns; briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Army, as good as ever had served in war, and following the dreadful name of Hannibal.

SECT. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio: treats with him about peace in vain; loseth a battle at Nedaqua, and persuades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarked his Army at Lepcis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercury, and some what more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse; which it was not easy for him to transport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, somewhat far from the enemy; that he might furnish himself of these and the like needful helps against the day of battle. From Lepcis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the Inland Country gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was fain to have in those days the best Horses of service, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party, making him understand, that if the Romans got the victory, it should be easy for Masaniissa, by their countenance and help to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes, as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that used it, prevailed with Tychæus, who shortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Mezæthib (the same who had made himself Protector over Masaniissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and adherer to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise, that Vernina the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assail the places that yielded the obedience to Masaniissa. This Vernina, as we find in Livie, came with more than 16 thousand men (for he lost more than to many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would have made the victory assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatness of his Acts: it offended them to think, that they had been so base as to make humble suit unto the Romans for peace; whilst they had such a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cause by War. But when as they bethought themselves of their own sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad; and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal, to do what he could out of hand. Hannibal made answer, that they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Army; but since he was general of their forces, He thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to do as a General ought to do; and to choose his own times. Nevertheless, to give them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama, and there encamped.

The Breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians: the violence done to his Embassadors; and the news of Hannibal's being landed in Africk, made Scipio to understand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield unto any conditions unprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore he sent unto Masaniissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out: praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other business apart. Ten Roman Companies of Horse and Foot together, Masaniissa had with him; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him service in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdom. But he well understood, that those and many more besides all his own forces, would but little avail him; if Hannibal should drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking first order as he could upon the sudden, for the safety of his own Kingdom; with four thousand Horse, and six thousand Foot, he made all haste unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Laelius and Fulvius, who brought them fate into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived, and understood what lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaved themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their own heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion.

M. Bebius one of the late Embassadors that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them; sending word unto his General, who was gone abroad to make War in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coyn, for injury by them lately done. Scipio

DE POLICE
LIV. 10.

pio was very glad to hear of this; and commanded Babinus to use them with all possible courtesy, and send them safe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves (which was a great Victory) far less honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, he made more cruel War upon them than before: taking their Towns by force; and putting them to sack, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by assault, to put all that came in their way, to the Sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to work such impression in the minds of those, with whom they had to do; they used oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beasts, that ran athwart them in the Streets: hewing their bodies asunder: as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practice at other times; it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revengeful minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so carnal in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discover where the Romans lay, what they were doing, and as much as might be, of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleasure, appointing one to conduct them up and down, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, he gave them leave to depart; and sent them unto their General. Hannibal understanding this, admired the bravery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew so desirous to have an Interview, and personal conference; and signified so much unto him by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that he would meet him shortly in a place convenient. The next day Masanius came with his Army: whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Town called Nedagara; near unto which he sat down, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serve his Camp. Thence he sent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly serve, if he had sought to lay to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within four miles of the Enemy; where he incamped well to his own good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were driven to take much pains in fetching that Water somewhat far off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a Troop of Horse, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a piece of ground; which was before well searched for fear of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off; and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliver his mind to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africa and of Italy, for that the Countreys of Sicily and Spain, about which their Fathers and themselves had driven, were no sufficient recom-

pence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had been shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, unto what extreme dangers their own Cities had been exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length to make an end of their obdurate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition, He ascribed. That his own years, and long trial of Fortune, both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fix his mind upon uncertain hopes, than upon a contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are subject. Yet (said he) mine own example may peradventure suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same Hannibal, who after my Victory at Cannæ, won the greatest part of Italy; and drew off with my self, what I should do with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought my Army to your Walls, as those last since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here intreating thee to grant us peace: This may serve as a document of Fortune's instability. I have fought with thy Father Scipio. He was the first of the Roman Generals that ever met me in the Field. I told thee little truth, that the time would come, that I should have such business, as now at the present, with his Son. But this is even one of Fortune's payments, wherof thou hast many. And thou must have experience of the like in thy self, who knows how long? Think upon M. Attilius: If he would have hearkened unto such persuasions, as I now rise to thee, he might have turned home to Rome an happy man, and so might thou do now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How fast thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, and whatsoever Islands else are situate between Italy and Africa be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans, to bear dominion therein? Thou shalt have glory enough by offering thus much; and the Romans may be glad of such a bargain. As for me, my own quiet shall benefit me give us contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make us faithfully observe the peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great a hazard thou must undergo for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou must have without contention. It is now in thine own power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it please thee: stay I until to morrow night, and thou must take such fortune as it pleases the Gods. This offer of peace is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steel we shall each of us bring into the field; but of the Victory neither of us have assurance. Let us therefore without more ado make Peace. And do not tell me that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treaty: It is I Hannibal that now desire Peace with thee, which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my Country. And thinking in expedient, I will always maintain it, like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the Gods did not envy me, the War by me begun.

Henceunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicily and in Spain which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntine, their their Confederates, had caused them to put on those arms; which the gods by the final issue of Wars had approved, and would approve to be most just. As for the mutability of Fortune, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that on the void ground of inflexible or overweening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For as it is not plain that all these Countreys, which which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already won from the Romans: If, said he, these conditions had been propounded whilst as yet we detained some part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason why I should remit unto you any one piece of these my former demands, to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be equitable in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the injuries which they have done me since, have made them unworthy of obtaining Peace upon so friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens understand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eased. Only thou must think, that in like sort it concerns me in honour, not to let them be gainers or losers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides these offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore unto us ransom-free, all Prisoners that we deliver of ours, to pay us five thousand Talents, to drive up their Gallies, and to deliver hostages for assurance of fair dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this by their breach of Truce, their spoiling of our Fleets, and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be so tempted, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these injuries newly done; then will I take advice with my counsel what answer to give you; otherwise you may even prepare for war, and blame your own selves for that I have denied you peace.

Hecuppon they brake off; and returned each to his own Camp. with no other news than war; bidding their Soldiers prepare for a battle, wherein should be decided the quarrel between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they issued into the Field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldom been found: whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battle at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, divided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance between them: Not far behind these followed the Principes; like wife divided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custom of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite unto the void spaces between the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was usual, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, wherof Hannibal had many. For of those Beasts, the danger was less whilst there was one way to let them through. Therefore he took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces between the first Battalions, they should not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Vetites, or those of the light armature that were to begin the Fight, he gave direction, that when they found themselves to be overcharged, either by the Enemies; or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should run back through those Lanes that were between the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army: thereby leaving room enough unto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to save themselves on the void ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battels, without cloying up the way by between the Maniples, which he desired to keep open. His Italian Horse he placed in the left wing, under C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masanius with his Numidians. He himself riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly: using words, not many, but forcible. He had them remember what they had achieved, since their coming into Africa. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the War was at an end; and that their Victory in this War, should make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whether they would lie. They were far from home, yet, and far from their own standing Camp: neither was there any place in Africa, that would give them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginian hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unless they would these wretched fables, under most merciful Enemies. In such necessity he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take refection answerable thereto, have never been known to fail of getting Victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more in number than fourcore, in Front of his Battle. Next behind these he made his Vanguard of all Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gauls, Balcarer and Moor. Then followed his Battle; which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more intermixed in the quarrel than were those Mercenaries; though not so good Soldiers: but to help (if it might be) of their want of courage, they had with them four thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a Furlong behind these, came his Reserve, consisting of those brave Soldiers, which had served him in his Italian Wars, and were the only men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lelius, in his own right wing, he bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tycheus and the Numidians, he placed in his left wing against Masanius. He was indeed far too weak for the Enemy in Horse, both in number and in goodfess. For Tycheus and Mazenubus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the four thousand of Masanius. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other, than such as could be levied in the half of a few days; and the remainder of those, that had of late been often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make these his companions alight and serve on Foot, setting better men in their Saddle. All that he could have done, was to lay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vermine the Son of Syphax come thither, as he did in a few days after, with sixteen thousand and upwards, the most of them Horse, the advantage of number might have served well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay, Hannibal must be fain to comfort himself with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian Soldiers; whose virtue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their several conditions: promising unto the Mercenaries bountiful rewards, threatening the Carthaginians with inevitable servitude, if they lost that day: but especially animating his old fellow-soldiers, by the many Victories which they had obtained against far greater numbers. He had them to look upon the Enemies, and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Army which they had slaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the Father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to run away. He told them, that these Legions, which they yonder beheld, were for the most part of them, the very worst of the Roman Souldiers; even such, as for their dauntless flight out of sundry battels, could no longer be trusted to bear Arms in their own Country. As for the rest, they were young men, the Sons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of those weapons, by which their Fathers were daily slain or chafed. Wherefore he intreated these his old companions, upon whose virtue he meant wholly to repose himself, that they would this day strive to make good their honour, and to purchase the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations used the two Generals before the Fight. When they drew near together, the Numidian Horse-men on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets and other instruments of War, sounded to battle: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of these Elephants (as they were always an uncertain kind of help) those that stood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear: and ran upon their own Numidian Horse, which they affrighted and disordered. Masaniissa clapping this, gave charge upon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to rally themselves, drave them quite out of the Field. The rest of those Beasts made a great spoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the spaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themselves, which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed, but ran back upon the right point of their own battle, and beyond that into the open Field. Here, withal they disordered the Carthaginian Horse, which were in that wing: against whom they gave to Lelius the same advantage that Masaniissa had against the Numidians; which he used in like sort. In the mean while, the battels of Foot advanced, and drew near together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gave a shout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacity, and in quickness to have the better of the Romans: wounded many, and doing more harm, than they took. But the Roman Discipline after a while prevailed against the boisterous violence of these untamed Barbarians, whereunto it helped not a little, that the battle of the Principes, following somewhat near after the Hastati, encouraged their fellows, and shewed themselves ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of help or comfort, from those that should have seconded them. For the new-leaved Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired Souldiers give back, did also themselves retire.

This caused the Ligurians, Gauls, and the rest, to think themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battle was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to give way unto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withal forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to ask them what they meant by this: Fear and Indignation caused those that were at once chafed by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own fellows, to turn their Arms with an heedless fury against the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and slain, through their own indiscretion, by their own Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to overbear this great medley of Enemies, that were together by the ears among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily fly. Such of them as escaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stir one foot, to help or save these Run-aways. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his own side, that would have rushed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aside beyond his battle, and save themselves in the open Field. The ground over which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and so slippery with blood, that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that war-like Army, which he saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well assured to receive a notable overthrow. He caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the main battle of the Hannibalsians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the days work till now, seemed to have been a matter of pause; in regard of the sharp Conflict, that was maintained between these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were also far the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps the better men.) They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground whereon he stood. So that, after a long time it was uncertain which part had the worse: unless it may seem, that the Romans were beginning to shrink; so far as the return of Masaniissa and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to have been most happy, and in a needful time. These upon a sudden charged the Hannibalsians in the Rear; and overbearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battle there dyed of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: On the Carthaginian side, above twenty thousand; besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal showed shewed in this his last Fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himself. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse; and being employed, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take Battle with such disadvantage, he would work no marvels. He saved himself with a few Horse; and stayed not in his Journey, till he came to Adrametum. Thence he was sent for to Carthage, from which he had been absent six and thirty years. At his coming into the Senate, He said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such Peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other course to take, resolved to send Embassadors again, and try the favour of Scipio, whose Arms they could not now resist.

Scipio having spoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Utica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies, and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the City; than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Ollavins; whom he willed to meet him there by Land. Then sending Lentulus away to Rome, with news of the Victory, set Sail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by ten Embassadors from the City: who bearing up with the Admirals Gally, began to use the pitiful gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it; he returned back to Utica, and called back Ollavins thither, with whom in person he set forwards for Tunes. As they were in their Journey thither, they heard the news, that Vermis the Son of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermis seems to have been both careless of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him, which did not only beat him, but so compass him in, that he hardly escaped himself with a few; leaving fifteen thousand of his followers dead behind him, and twelve hundred taken Prisoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginians lost by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this Victory, though it were no great access unto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more pitiful than it had been before, yet it procured less commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this War, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the War against Hannibal at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to pass over into the Isle of Sicily (as it were in chafe of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africa; and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suit for the same Province of Africa; and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that he being Consul might joyn with Scipio. were it no more than with equal authority. But ere he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readiness for the Journey, wherein no man cared to further him, Winter came on; and he was only tolt at Sea with foul weather; first upon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyful news to Rome, of the Victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the War was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africa for his Province, that he said he would suffer nothing to pass in the Senate, until he had first his will. Much ado there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the War continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadors. He willed them to consider what they had deserved: and in regard thereof, to think themselves well dealt withal; in that he was contented to leave unto them their liberty and their own Laws, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africa, such as they were at the beginning of this War. As touching the rest he was at a point, that, before he either granted them Peace or Truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yield, then required, He, That immediately they should deliver up to the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, that they had of theirs; likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten; and all their Elephants. That they should make no War as all thenceforth out of Africa, neither yet within Africa, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Towns, Goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Masinissa, or to any of his Ancestors, who were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him: That they should find Corn for the Roman Army, and Wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, until the Peace were fully concluded; that they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the term of Fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year, and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred Hostages: such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadors returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very displeasing; and therefore one Gisco stood up to speak against them: and exhorted the People, who gave good attention, that they should not condescend unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withal what favourable audience was given to this vain Orator, by the unjust, yet unwarlike multitude, was hold to pull him down from his standing, by plain force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose up and spake unto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customs of the City would allow; so far as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine years old, until he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excused himself of the disorder, he discoursed unto them concerning the Peace: and persuaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves, had the Demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice they resolved to yield unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thousand pounds weight in Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadors. Scipio granted them Truce for three Months, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But here-withall he gave injunction, that they should neither in the mean while send Embassadors any whither else, nor yet dismiss any Embassadors to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries wherewith Carthage was fallen, through their malicious counsels. Asdrubal, furnished the Kid, a venerable man, and a great Friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining Peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadors, who related unto the Senate and People these joyful news. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadors from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for Audience, till the Election of new Consuls, then in hand, was finished; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Praetors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering unto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified unto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadors, that had lately been sent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellows, and there, Jewing men, made War upon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was between him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Country-men, that had lately served Hannibal for Pay; and being taken Prisoners in Africk, were kept in Bonds by Scipio, might be released and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks, which were confederate with Rome, enduring so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to fly behind, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings Subjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed it to be one of the Kings Counsel, and very inward with him: one that served not for money, but carried money with him, and four thousand men, sent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these points, when the Macedonian Embassadors could make unto the Senate no good answer, they were willing to return, and tell their Master, That War he sought, and War he should find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points he had broken the League that was between him and the Romans: First, in that he had wronged their Confederates: and Secondly, in that he had aided their Enemies against them, with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countreys, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadors in their solicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entered into the Senate: and Asdrubal above the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadors to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Romans side; saying, that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the City, that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsel. But if Hanno, and himself might have had their will, the Carthaginians, even at the behest of their Fortune, should have granted the Peace, which they now desired. Here-withall he commended the moderation of the Romans; as no small argument of their Valour; by which always they had been Victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadors: all of them entreating to have the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversity of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproach of Perjury, as they themselves might have laid upon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would swear to keep the Peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answer; Even by the same gods, that are so severe unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus, the Consul, interposing the authority of his office, would have hindered the Senate from proceeding unto conclusion of Peace; for that hereby he was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making War in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the People, in whom reposed the Sovereign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates, sent unto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, upon such conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this favour, the Carthaginian Embassadors humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visit their Country-men, which were Prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransom and carry home with them those that were their especial Friends; of whom they gave in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadors would choose, should be sent over into Africk, and be freely released.

ferred to liberty by Scipio, when the Peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joy with Scipio in Communion.

At their coming into Africk, the Peace was given, and accepted, without any controversy or dispute. The Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, than upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasury could have spared two hundred Talents for the present; yet since the pension was annual, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the sum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which, when he was checked by Asdrubal Hedus, and told, That it worst of all befamed him to laugh, since he had been the cause why all others did weep: He answered, That laughter did not always proceed from joy; but sometimes from extremity of indignation: Ier, said He, My laughter is more justifiable, and less absurd, than your tears. For ye should have wept when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants; and when ye bound your own hands from the use of Arms, without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps us under, and holds us in assured servitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, ye have thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, that it was the very least part of your misery for which ye have shed these tears. Thus discoursed Hannibal unto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsel, repented when it was too late; and instead of cursing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous Disfate, accused the Physician, whose noble endeavours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Masaniissa, and magnified him in presence of the Army, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him he also conferred over those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held; wherein, to fly truth, he gave him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romans, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarked themselves for Sicily; where when they arrived at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Army took his way home to Rome by Land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no less glorious than any triumph: all the People thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he passed along. He entered the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great joy of the People, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and dying soon after in prison; or whether he were dead a while before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, that it was a barbarous custom of the Romans, to insult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea, though they were such, as had always made fair and courteous War. But heretofore we shall have better example ere the same age pass. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio, as did the contemplation of that grievous War past, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope that ever they should sit Italy free. This made them look cheerfully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: styling him by the name of that Province, which he had subdued. This honourable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of less desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated unto themselves the title of Countreys, wherein they had performed little or nothing, as if such glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

OF the great similitude found in worldly event, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a Subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are less to wonder, if we find less variety: since it is unto the humane power, and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Achyrians or Chalcidians invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and therefore thousand Horſes; but failing in their intended conquest, they became Subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Perſians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with such number of men, as might have seemed irresistible. But after that the Perſians were beaten home again, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine War, devoted upon the conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his tough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes; or Cyrus with his well trained Army, had made attempt upon Greece, the issue might, in humane reason, have been far different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them, to employ the travel and virtue of their men, rather than the greatness of their names against those people, that were of so less tallant, (though less renowned,) than their own. For the increasing virtues used by Cyrus, and some small displacements done to the Greeks (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Perſians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdoms, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolf, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Aſs. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by mis-understanding the language of Time; and despising the vertues that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be failed by any of less-noted excellence. Against the same stone: whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evimerach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus

the Epirot had dashed his foot: He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greek King, when he entered into the war against the Romans. This war he undertook as it were for his minds sake; having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail too easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended conquest, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans by their victory against Pyrrhus had found their own vertue to be of richer metal, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: than did all the bravery of the Epirots (his Elephants, and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. * For since they had overcome the best Warrior in Greece, even him, that being thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwelcome Provinces, which in compass of 12 years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more: than to bring to their own devotion: what should hinder them from the conquest of all the rest, this done, would follow it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed from after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after news in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion: that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skillful Mariners; yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Thyrian Queen Lenta made at the same time cruel war upon the Greeks: warring their Country, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrel, if the Romans were desirous to enter, the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their accomplishing of that war, which they made with her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing here happened: though they sent Embassadors, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they

* The King of Spain desired immoderately to be King of Spain, being weary of the little King of Spain, and invited to that of Spain, and having broken the great Fleet that over the Spanish gattered together, he never made account of any of his preparations after that time.

they had undertaken this Thyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance between the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards increased very hastily, through the indifference of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them, now being the subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reign, and his first actions. It was like to prove a bulle time in the world, when, within the space of 4 years, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countreys known; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdoms. This happened from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus; afterwards called the Great. Ptolomy Philopater succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt unto his father Evergates. And Philip the son of Demetrius, being 16 or 17 years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Acheans and most of the Greeks, by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Dofon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Laedemon, and the Countreys about Mount Taurus. For Antiochus then began his reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King over the Laedemonians, whose Common-wealth, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headless; and Achaus, a kinsman of Antiochus but a Rebel unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the one hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomy, and the rest, we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Acheans, and many other his dependants. That Country, having freed it self by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an calie subjection unto Cleomenes; was now become no less obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have been to the Spartans; and therewithal it lay open unto the violence of the Aetolians; who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Aetolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messinians that were their own Clients, (and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no less unexpected, then it was unjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoil of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Acheans, were called by the Messinians to help: which they did the more willingly; because the Aetolians pailing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Achaus could hardly abide the Aetolians as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries, wherewith most ingratulily they had required no small benefits done to them by the Acheans. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon their Army, that he could hardly endure to lay few dyes until the time of his own Office came; being chosen Pretor of the Acheans for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage; and he shewed himself a man fiercer (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of Army. He suffered them to pass quietly along with their booty, through a part of the Countrey, when he might very easily have hindered them; and afterwards pressed them so near, that they had recovered ground of advantage; that they easily dedicated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Acheans, they got hereby only the friendship of the Messinians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Aetolians invaded Peloponnesus again: having no more to do, than to pass over the narrow Straights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulf of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There joynd with them, in this their second invasion, that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of sitting out no Ships or war unto the Coast of Greece; made bold to keet adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Phariis, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Thyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rout of the Thyrians under Sardulander, or Serdalides, having gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompanied the Aetolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havoc in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfy themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment to be laid upon the Laedemonians, who were thought underhand to have favoured the Aetolians, in meer despite of the Acheans and Macedonians; by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Laedemonians had been so affected; and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they flew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstain from coming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease, and meant always to remain in his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Antiochus, who then wholly governed him) did mis-understand the Laedemonians; but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Acheans, Baetians, Epirots, and Acarnanians; all complaining upon the Aetolians; and desiring to have War decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Aetolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time; if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be held at Rhium for that purpose: whether it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been thereat the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certain, they adjourned the Council unto a further time, saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open War was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were, to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their prator, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesus; and the only man, in a fort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went unto Macedon, where he prepared busily for the War against the year following. He also assayed the Thyrians Seerdaiades, with fair words and promises; whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, for as much as the Ætolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Acheans, who had first of all others proclaimed the War in their own Country, sent unto the Acaranians, Epiriots, Molossians, and Lacedæmonians, requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Ætolians; without saying (as it were) to wait the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acaranians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithful meaning in that War, which was concluded by general assent. The Epiriots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needless point, and desired to be held excused, until Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Molossians, for whose cause the war was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders, and said, that they durst not be over-bold, until that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chief of them studied only, how to manage the treason for which their City had been so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subject against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should return out of Egypt to reign over them again, and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephebi. Of these there were some, that thought the publick safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonians that had preserved them. And hereto they referred all their counsels: being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part were still desiring, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his return; and fought to joy with the Ætolians, which were most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had this more authority, and durst more freely speak their minds: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended, fancying unto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as they were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them unto their greatness and laire; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deserving virtue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helps, they must continue little better than subjects unto the Macedonians, and far less by him respected, than were the Acheans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassie to Sparta: which pronounced the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himself the Author. Much disputation, and hot there was, between those of the Macedonian party, and those their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; until by massacre or banishment of all, or the chief, that spake against the Ætolians: the diversity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Acheans, who had spared the City, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardless of their ancient Laws, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may justly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royal Families they found Agapollis, the son of Agapollis, the son of King Cleomenes; and him they admitted to reign over them, as their apparent to his Grandfather. This Agapollis was a young Boy, standing in need of a Guardian; and had an Uncle, his Fathers Brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet because the Law required, that the son, how young soever, should have his fathers whole right and Title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in need of a man, were so punctual in observation of the Law, that they made this child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royal Family, though there was no want of others: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodnes of his Claim, but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, bestowed upon each of the Ephebi, a Talent, and thereby himself be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus to gratifie his Partisans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Country of the Argives; which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmonian. After such open hostility, the Lacedæmonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed War against the Acheans.

Thus

Thus the beginnings of the War fell out much otherwise, than the Acheans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epiriots gave uncertain answer: the Molossians would not stir: all the burden must lye upon themselves and the poor Acaranians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could assail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, pulling over the Bay of Corinth, surpris'd the Town of Ægira: which if they could have held, they should therefore grievously have molested the Acheans, for that it stood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sycion, two of their principal Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all the Country. But as Ægira was taken by surpris: so was it presently lost again, through greediness of spoil; whilst they that should have made it their first care, to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the citadel and other pieces of strength, fell heedlessly to ransack private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great laughter back unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; waiting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achean Confederacy. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for help unto their Prator, and to all the Towns of their Society in vain. For the Acheans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had covetously with-held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Acheans, and insufficiency of their Prator; the Dymeans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick service, and to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Acadians that were confederate with Philip and the Acheans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians; whilst their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnesus. The Epiriots joyed all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier piece, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. These happy days, ere he could end the business; which tended only to the benefit of the Epiriots. Had he entered into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming in; it is thought that he might have had an end of the War. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not seldom, that the importunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindring the prosecution of their main designs. Thus was our King Henry the VIII. led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Townay: at such time as the French King Lewis the XII. hearing that the strong City of Torin was lost, and that his Ca-vallry, wherein rested his chief confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earl of Edlex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himself into Britain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracia did wondrously embolden the Ætolians in such sort, as their Prator Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to over-run Thessalie, but to make impetion into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea; which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, he took, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly building therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his return; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Peloponnesus, but even to Macedon itself. But this their pride was soon abated; and they rewarded forthwith at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his work at Ambracia, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He took Phloxia, Metropolis, Onedia, Pæstum, Eleans, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs, of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes; and waited all the Country over, without receiving any harm. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Peloponnesus, and to do the like spoil in the Country of the Eleans, where to he was vehemently solicited by the Achean Embassadors; news came out of Macedon, that the Dardaniens were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. These Dardaniens were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hemus from the Northern part of Macedon, and were accustomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Country: as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismiss the Achean Embassadors, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So he took his way home-wards; and as he was passing out of Acarania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Phariss, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chafed out of his Kingdom by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Dofon in the wars of Cleomenes; and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready at their first request, to take part with Philip Captains. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King; whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardaniens hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army, and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way. All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessaly, whilst his People gathered in their Harvest. But the Ætolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epiriots: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they required with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was, the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dionæ. When Winter grew on, and all thought of War, until another year, was laid aside: Philip took a Journey into Peloponnesus, with 5000 Foot, and about 400 Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth; He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word should be carried forth of his arrival. He sent privately for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achean Souldiers ready to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Country, without somewhat more than two thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse, little thinking to meet with opposition. Indeed they had little cause to fear: since the Acheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; until they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellows, were by him surprized, and all made Prisoners, or slain. By this exploit which he did at his first coming Philip got very much reputation and likewise he purchased both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Ephebus, an exceeding strong Town, in the Borders of Acadæia, which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He won it by assault at his first coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake such a piece of work at such an unreasonable time of the year, was careless of providing even such store of Weapons, as might have served to defend it. The Town was surprized by the King from sailing; and given to the Acheans of his mere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lefbos, which yielded for very fear, leaving how easily he had taken Ephebus. This Town also he gave to the Acheans. The like liberality he used towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the People were addicted to Husbandry and lived abroad in Villages; even such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done sacrifice to Jupiter, feasted his Captains, and refreshed his Army three days; he proceeded on to the foot of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians, in the spoils of their otherwise-defriving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattle he took, with great numbers of Slaves, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could be found in rich Villages. Then he fell in hand with the Towns, wherinto a great multitude of the Country People were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yielded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his Journey, by sending Embassadors to yield before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their will, took courage to fit themselves at liberty, by fleeing the King to near: to whose Patronage thenceforth they betook themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolians Captains; because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Country, than the sharpness of Winter would suffer him to stay there days. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians; but they made such haste from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had covered themselves within the Town of Spartonum; where they thought to have been safe. But Philip assailed them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yield the place, obtaining licence to to depart with their Lives and Arms. Having performed so much in this expedition, the King reposited himself a while in Megalopolis, and then removed to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Teloponnisus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Acadæia; and threatened to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdom of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money, so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him: nor from those jealousies, with which Ursurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royal blood, that thinking himself to have brought right unto the Kingdom, purposed to make way thenceunto by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirm himself, by propounding unto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equal distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common-wealth. He won to his party some two hundred men; with whom he fell upon the Ephori, as they were together at Supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his House: who perceiving the danger, fled away and fled. It remained that he should give account of these doings to the People, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds not being heretofore disposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilst he was using his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabouts they went, and retired privately away. So he lived afterwards among the Acheans, a banished man, and hated of his own People. As for Lycurgus he returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Agisippus, whereby he made himself Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected in such sort, as once he should have been applauded by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have been detested; yet rather than to adventure himself into judgment, he chose to flee for a time, and sojourn among his Friends the Ætolians. His well-known vehemency in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him such good liking among the People, that in his absence they began to consider the weakness of their own furnishes against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, he took better heed unto himself: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chased Agisippus out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, that this being the first of three Ursurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whatsoever he was toward some private Citizens, in the War against Philip, he behaved himself as a provident man, and careful of his Country's good.

SECT.

SECT. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsellors: who afterwards wrought Treason against him; and were justly punished. He invades the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for Peace: which is granted unto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos devising upon his business for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied to diligently for their own greatness, as they were like to have spoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Dæmus had left unto Philip such Counsellors, as to him did seem the fittest men for governing of his Youth. The chief of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his Person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himself a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable piece of service to his Prince, if he could reduce the Acheans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to pass, during the late expedition, he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Acheans out of their Lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out: he was bold to challenge some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whip them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their Fellows; and then he laid by the heels, and punished as Mutineers. Herby he thought to bring it to pass by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habit of little obedience; and think nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Acheans were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the War against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus: and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begun. Herat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought to well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable Service, in business of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the head: since, in biting at the Tail, the Fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be, than that among the Acheans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he acquired unto, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court: promising to become their especial Friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Acheans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Acheans, and all other Pe-laponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Acheans were to hold Election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needful in a business of more importance, the King by fair words and threatenings together, obtained so much, that Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Favourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction unto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Pattus and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yielded it up for fear, at his first coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had a earnest desire to bellow it upon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no Messengers from the Eleans, to sue for Peace. For at his departure out of their Country the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his Prisoner: because he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyn with him upon reasonable terms. This if they could be contented to do, he willed Amphidamus to let them understand, that he would render unto them freely all Prisoners which he had of theirs: That he would defend them from all forraign invasions; and that they should hold their liberty entire, living after their own Laws, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any Garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit, as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new invasion upon their Country: then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-hasty to believe such fair promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on work for no other end, than to breed a mutual diffidence between them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands upon him, and send him Prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himself, in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) marveling what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles his Counsellor, thereby took occasion to supplant Aratus. He said, that old Aratus, and his Son together, had such devices in their Heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arats, (the Father and the Son) had taken him aside, and given him to understand, that it would be very prejudicial to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonians: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very careful in doing this message: nor the Eleans in hearkening to the Kings offers. All this was a false lye, devised by Apelles himself, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arats, and bade Apelles rehearse it over again to their Faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had said all the rest, e're either Philip or they spake any words.

word; He added this clause, as it were, in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such ungrateful wretches, it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Acheans; and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your selves. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; That whensoever he heard any accusation, especially against a Friend of his own, or a man of worth, He should forbear a while to give credit, until he had diligently examined the business. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should never thereof repent him. At the present he said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himself the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans ye, and anothers so. Hereof the King liked well; and said, that he would make sufficient inquiry. So passed a few days; wherein whilst Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befallen him there. The King was not forgetful, to examine him about the conspiracy of the Arati; which, when he found no better than a meer device against his honourable Friends, he entertained them in a loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance, and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The unfruitful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to pass, began (as commonly Ambition useth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himself to his cunning again; and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the Vulgar, he had prepared a Snare for the Arati; so falling of them, he thinks it wisdom to lay for the King himself, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow, which drew away flies out of the Chimney; but was carried (Net and all) into the Air by the Bird, that was too strong to be caught, and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, and Megaleus chief of the Secretaries, were easily won to beat Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remove the other two from their places, and put one Creatures of his own into their rooms. Against Alexander he went, to work the ordinary way, by calumination and privy detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he used more fineness; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of War, and one, whom for his many virtues the King might ill spare from being always in his presence. By such Art he thought to have removed him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warm Sun. In the mean season Aratus retired himself; and fought to avoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Pretor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the people.

Wherefore a great deal of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corn, wherewith he should have been furnished by the Acheans. This made the King understand his own error: which he wisely sought to reform betimes. He perswaded the Acheans to rejoin their Parliament from Regium, to Sicyon, the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travel of these worthy men, he easily obtained what he would of the Acheans. Fifty Talents they gave him out of hand; with great store of Corn; and further decreed, That so long as he himself in person followed the Wars in Peloponnesus, he should receive ten Talents a month. Being thus enabled, he began to provide Shipping, that so he might invade the Aitolians, Eleans, and Lacedaemonians, that were maritime People, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things go forward so well without his help; even by the ministry of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entered into conspiracy with Leontius and Megaleus; binding himself and them by Oath, to cross and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to pass, that very want of ability to do any thing without them should make him speak them fair, and be glad to submit himself to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child; and therefore these wile men perswaded themselves, that by looking big upon him; and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own misgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a Child still. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the provisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two laid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindful of their wicked Oath, than of their Duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readiness; Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his Forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Aitolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would have fallen, as soon after it did, upon themselves. But against the Eleans, and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Acheans, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. He himself, with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephalonia; whence the Aitolians, dwelling over against it, used to furnish themselves of Shipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he belieged the Town of Palaea, that had been very serviceable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates; and might be very useful to him, if he could get it. Whilst he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen Ships of War from Scordilidae; and many good Soldiers from the Epirots, Acarnanians and Messianians. But the Town was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts save one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred Foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembering his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his best; and and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slain, not of the worst Soldiers, but such as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treason of their Captain, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the Victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedy: and therefore he thought upon breaking up the Siege. For it was easier unto the Towns-men to make up the Gap in their Wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed and uncertain what course to take: the Messianians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their own Country. The Messianians alleged, that Lyconus was busy in waiting their Country: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Etesian Winds which then blew, serving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those Winds, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-days) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gave better counsel, and prevailed: he shewed how unsetting it were, to let the Aitolians overrun all Thessaly again, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Army far off to seek small adventures. Rather, he said, that the time now served well to carry the War into Aetolia: since the Pretor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their strength. As for Lyconus, he was not strong enough to do much harm in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against them. According to this advice, the King set Sail for Aetolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Aitolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their Borders, and joyed with him as many of them as could bear Arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad Neighbours. He marched up into the inland Country: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aitolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great flatness, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow steep, and difficult ascent. There did the Aitolians use to hold all their chief meetings their Fairs, their election of Magistrates, and their solemn Games. There also they used to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of great fecundity. This opinion of the natural strength, had made them careless in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoil: wherof he found fish plenty, that he thought the pains of his journey well recompensed. So he loaded his Army; and confuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Aitolians; in remembrance of their like courtship, shewed upon the Temples of Dion and Dodana. This burning of the Temple, might (questionless) more for the Kings honour have been forborn. But perhaps he thought, as Montem du Gomerus the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no Faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Aitolians lay for him: which that they would do, he believed before, and therefore was not taken unawares.

Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush, fell upon his skirts: but he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Thyrians; who staying behind the rest, did set upon the backs of the Aitolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rear the Army that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came; and burning down those places that he had taken before, as also wafting the Country round about him. He safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Aitolians made countenance of Fight, issuing out of Straum in great bravery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very Gates.

The joy of this victorious expedition being every way complex, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great Feast unto all his Friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleus. They came because they could not choose; but their heavy looks argued, what little pleasure they took in the Kings prosperity. It grieved them to think, that they should be able to give on better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings business; since Apelles himself, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischievous dexterity. Finding Aratus was the way home to his Tent, they fell to reviling him, throwing Stones at him, so that they caused a great uproar: many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King fending to enquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed: Which made him send for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleus, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to give him forward answers: infomuch, as they said at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischief as he deserved. Hereupon the King committed them to Ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleus, yea, and to cast him into Prison? Why said the King, it was even I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both loud and angry; feeling himself out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleus was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hindrance of the Kings Victory at Fales, and the Compact made with Apelles; matters no less touching Leontius, than flood by as a looker on, than Megaleus that was accused. In conclusion, the pretensions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crimus one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crimus being remanded back to Prison; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megaleus. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deal of business of this year. For as soon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an Expedition against the Lacedaemonians. Thence and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponnesus; whilst the King was absent. The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill success, yet so, as they

hundred them from doing such harm as else they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Country about Lacedæmon; and was in a manner at the Gates of Sparta; c're men could well believe that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waft in the fields; and having beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattle, flaves, and other Country spoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, that requested him to let Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience; and he willed them to deal first with the Ætolians, who if they would make the same request, should not find him uncomformable. The Ætolians had sped ill that year: neither saw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had sent forth to waste Thessaly and Macedon found such opposition on the way, that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean season they had been grievously afflicted, as before was shewed, by Philip in the centre of their own Country. All Greece and Thessaly was up in arms against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keep the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertained this negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirty dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to treat his presence at a Diet of the Nation, that should be held at Rhium; whether if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilst these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalæus thought to have terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this device sort to no good effect. The Soldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger spent it self in a noise, and breaking open of doors, without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea, the Soldiers themselves repenting of their insolence, desired to have the Authors of the tumult fought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megalæus were afraid, lest the matter would soon come out of it self to their extreme danger. Wherefore they went unto Appelles, the Head and Architect of their treason: requesting him speedily to repair unto Corinth, where he might stand between them and the Kings displeasure. Appelles had not all this while been wanting to the business undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessaly addressed themselves unto him, and received from him their dispatch in every business. Likewise the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occasion to magnifie the virtue of Appelles, making slight mention (only for fashion sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Appelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himself out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his special care, that money and all things needful for the publick service, should be wanting. Yea, fell his own Plate and household vessels: thinking to resolve these and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sirs, be ruled wholly by me, all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would give assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his journey from Chelæi in the Isle of Eubœa, to the City of Corinth, where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pomp and royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megalæus drew forth to meet him on the way. So entering the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falsehood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was pretty thing, that such a check as this, made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace: in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his own Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then, some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of privacy, he used him not at all. This taught Megalæus to look to himself, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of service, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signify what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent unto the King in his behalf. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the debt of Megalæus, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the Souldiers made Philip more hasty than else he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere the letters of Megalæus were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words, and biding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to sink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King understood more perfectly the falsehood, not only of Megalæus, but of Appelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him so poor. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megalæus that was fled to Thebes. As for Appelles, he committed both him, his son, and another that was inward with him, to prison; whereof all the formerly ended their lives. Megalæus also, neither daring to stand to trial, nor knowing whither to flee, was weary of his own life, and slew himself about the same time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this war, upon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Name of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this young young Prince tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it: Nevertheless, being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Appelles, Leontius, and Megalæus, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by some of the Kings Targettiers, they became to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorry. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this unquiet Nation; he thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning, and continuing the War should rest upon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for War against the year following, wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then granted he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter into their own Country. In this return homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolomy, a companion with Appelles, and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his imprisonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels use to build, in their favour with the multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Towns, from which the Dardaniens, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his Kingdom: when he had thus provided for safety of his own; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Chians, with others from Peloponnesus the City of Ægypt, and from the City of Bizantium, recontaining the former solicitation about the peace. This faction had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to let the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found Intercessors, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his advantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad fought to bind unto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good Souldiers. But heretofore it came to pass, that the more forward fort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robbery, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured that if they had the worst, The love of Greece would be sufficient for to redeem their quiet. They had, since the late Treaty of Peace, done what harm they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Acheans, and finding in fear to be more fondly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the War as soon as they might. Philip made such answer unto the Embassadors, as he had done the former years: That he gave not occasion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to live in rest, must first be dealt withal, to signify plainly their determination, whereto himself would return such answer as he should think fit. Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the middle of this Negotiation, that he was advertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battle at Thorsymus. These letters he communicated unto Demetrius Phariur; who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting a Namptun. There did Agellus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleasure dispute about finishing War between themselves, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seek by all means to enter footing in Greece. For this could he find it were good, that their Country should be at peace within it self; and that Philip, if he were desirous of War, should lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly given to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they stood in fear of danger threatening them at hand: but being soon after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were loath from observing and following their own good counsel, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselves and the whole Country (but themselves before any other part of the Country) under servitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keep what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

SECT. III.

Philip, at the persuasion of Demetrius Phariur, enters into League with Hannibal against the Romans. The tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

This being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the business of Italy, of which he consulted with Demetrius Phariur. And thus passed the time away, till the great battle of Cannæ: after which he joyed in least with Hannibal, as hath been shewed before. Demetrius Phariur bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own lost Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonians, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsel, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwile been far more expedient for Philip, to have supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, he should perhaps have brought them to peace upon some equal terms; and thereby, as did Hæro, a far weaker Ætolian, have both secured his own Estate, and caused each of them to be defrased of chief place in his friendship. The issue of the counsel which he followed, will appear soon after this. His first quarrel with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon such Conditions that might easily be broken, have been related in another place, as belonging unto the second Punick War. Wherefore I will only here set down the tenour of the League between them and Carthage, which may seem not worthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it self then used; though it had been over long to have been inserted into a more bule piece.

The Oath and Covenants between Hannibal General of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassadour of Philip King of Macedon.

This is the League ratified by Oath, which Hannibal the General, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocai, also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the son of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the son of Demetrius hath sent unto us, for himself and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo, before* the God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolous: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before the Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth: before Rivers and Meadows, and Waters: before all the Gods that have power over Carthage: before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the rest of Greece: before all the Gods that are Presidents of War, and are present at the making of this League. Hannibal the General hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians, in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us, that this Oath stand for friendship and loving affection, that We become friends familiar, and brethren, upon Covenant: that the Justice of the Lords the Carthaginians and of Hannibal the General, and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians using the same Laws, and of the Uticans, and of many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Associates, and of all Towns and Nations with which we hold friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship, or make alliance hereafter in this Regions, be preferred by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greeks as are their Associates. In like manner, shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Associates, be saved and preferred by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that they the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter give with Us in Italy. We shall not take Council one against the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readiness and good will, without deceit or subtilty, We shall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which we have already league and friendship. We also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already league and friendship. The War that We have with the Romans, have ye also with them, until the Gods shall give Us a new and happy end. We shall aid Us with those things whereof we have need, and shall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods shall not give unto You and Us their help in this War against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, We shall make friendship in such wise, that ye shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not have power to make War upon You: Neither shall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyraens, nor over those of Apollonia, nor Dyrhachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Antinania. They shall also render unto Demetrius Pharius all that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make War upon You or Us, We will succour one another in that War, as either shall have need. The same shall be observed in War made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendship. To this league, if We or Ye shall think fit to add or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

SECT. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural vices, being there in soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free States and Associates: With the troubles into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punick War. The poisonous Attitudes and gestures hateful to the Romans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himself as a virtuous Prince. And though with more commination of his wisdom, he might have offered his friendship to the Romans that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royal greatness of mind; with a desire to secure and increase his own estate, adding therewithal reputation to his Country. But in this business he was guided (as hath been said) by Demetrius Pharius: who looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himself to his desires: and thereby forthly governed him as he listed. For the virtues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustful, bloody, and tyrannical: desirous of power to do what he listed, and not otherwise lifting to do what he ought, than for so far forth, as by making a fair shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should help to serve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he should busie himself in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policy, to bring the Greeks that were his Associates unto a more absolute form of subjection. Hereunto Apples had advised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apples was a boyishorous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himself deeply wronged, if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to observe the Kings humours: and guided like a Coach-

Coach-man, with the reins in his hand, those affections which himself did only seem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus; which the violence of Apples could never do.

There arose about these times a very hot Faction among the Messinians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a foreign War) unto domesticall objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In process of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resolving to to end the matter, that they should not henceforth drive any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himself. At his coming thither, he found Aratus busie among them to make all Friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with such of the Messinians as were united unto him. He asked the Governours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Laws to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble? Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, he said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselves to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilst each of them presumed on the Kings assistance: they thought it best to go roundly to work, ere that he were gone, that should countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers up of the multitude unto sedition. Upon this occasion, the people took Aratus and running upon the Nobility and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage, almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seems, that it would be easy to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs their Guardians were slain. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand, wherein he should need the help and countenance of his best Friends, he was content to smother his displeasure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aside by the hand, and went up into the Castle of Ithome, that was over Messene. There he pretended to do sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keep the place to his own use: for that it was of notable strength, and would serve to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whilst he was there, fore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the Beast delivered into his hands, as was the manner, he shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himself. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have soothed him a little, were it only for desire for to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his Son. But as Aratus found doubtful what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a Soothsayer, thou mayst go thy way, and let slip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou mayst not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Ose by both his Hairs. Thus he spake resembling Ithome and Acrocorinth unto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needs hear the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Messinians: But if, by seizing upon Ithome, he must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit: then were it far better to depart with his Souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good will, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his Friends become his Enemies.

To this good advice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike therewith growing between him and the Aratus: whom he thought more forward than befitted them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly discovered his tyrannous purposes; so likewise he perceived, that in referring to his house, he had been discomfited with his Sons Wife. He therefore staid at home: where as good leisure he might report, that in despite of Cleomenes, his own Country-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to bear him company. In this Journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unheeded counsels are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and to they purposed to continue. But he would needs have them to remain, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore he made them the more obnoxious unto his will, as he forced upon their Town of Ozicem, and laid siege to Apollonia; having no good colour of these doings: but thinking himself strong enough to do what he listed, and not feeling whence they should procure Friends to follow them. Thus instead of securing the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whilst he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should have fought for him in Italy, M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts: who not only maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Ætolians to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War: the occurrences whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In managing whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captain: yet when leisure served, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the liberty of the Messinians; but made another journey into their own Country, with hope to deceive them as before. They understood him better now than before; and therefore were not hally to trust him so far. When he saw that his cunning would not serve, he went to work by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could do little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to help him in such an enterprise. In this attempt upon

Messinians

Mefene, he left Demetrius Phariis; that was his Counsellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he sped, the more angry he waxed against those that seemed not to favour his injurious doing. Wherefore, by the ministry of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poisoned old Aratus, and shortly after that, he poisoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would never have been known, because they were done secretly, and the poisons themselves were more sure than manifest in operation. The Spartans, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Processions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Priest unto him for that purpose; as was accustomed unto the Herods, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have been true, since the help of the Devil is never failing to the increase of Idolatry.

The living memory of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but work in the Achaean a marvellous dislike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsel for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in case to subtil, without his help that had committed it. The Achaean were a most outrageous people, great darters, and shameless robbers. With these the Romans made a League: whereof the Conditions were soon divulged, especially that main point, concerning the division of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Achaean should have the Country and Towns; but the Romans the Spoil, and carry away the people to sell for Slaves. The Achaean, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make trait alliance with the Achaean, as knowing their unkind disposition; were much the more averse from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations, except their own) to make havock of the Country. The same consideration moved also the Lacedaemonians to stand off a while, before they would declare themselves for the Achaean, whose friendship they had embraced in the late War. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achaean his Confederates, sufficed to retain them: especially, at such time, as their own necessity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himself the Dymaeans by an inestimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Achaean; and redeeming their people wherefore they might be found, that had been carried away Captive, and sold abroad for Slaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences past: if the malignity of his natural condition had not other-whiles broken out, and given men to understand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodness. Among other foul acts, whereof he was not ashamed, he took Polyperata the Wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might beget to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the second time: for, of that which happened in this their first Invasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

SECT. V.

Of Philopœmen General of the Achaean: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedaemon. A battle between them, wherein Machanidas is slain.

It happens often, that the decease of one eminent man, discovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood up Philopœmen: whose notable Valour, and great skill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achaean redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careless of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their Neighbours. This is that Philopœmen, who being then a young man, and having no command, did especial service to Antigonus at the battle of Sekasia against Cleomenes. Thence forward until now, he had spent the most part of his time in the Isle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldom or never at Peace between themselves, he battered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himself so strictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy to have his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces; as also he so diligently trained them up in all exercise of Service, that he made the Achaean very strong in that part of their Forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or General of the Nation, he had no less care to reform their Military Discipline throughout, whereby his Country might be strong enough to defend itself, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He persuaded the Achaean to out of their vain expence of bravery, in Apparel, Household-stuff, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost upon their Arms: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to prove the better Soldiers, and futable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had served hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast afar off; that were useful in skirmishing at some distance, or for surprisals, or sudden and hasty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had been most accustomed. But when they came to handy-flores, they were good for nothing, so long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to arm themselves more weightily, to use a larger kind of shield, with good Swords, and strong Pikes, fit for Service at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files too deep as had been accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might use the service of many hands.

Eight months were spent of that year, in which he first was Prætor of the Achaean, when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedaemon caused him to make trial, how his Soldiers had profited by his Discipline. This Machanidas was the successor unto Lysegrus, a man more violent than his fore-goe. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta, but to hold the City in obedience to himself perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achaean, that were favourers of liberty; but to strengthen himself by friendship of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of vicior vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedaemon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achaean, and Macedonians, were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwilfully. For in seeking to take revenge upon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselves thereby from recovering the Matter of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would not follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but always make him ready to fall upon his Neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilst they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turn face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had usually made him fail of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achaean, and thought his own men better Soldiers than were theirs.

Whilst Philip therefore was busied elsewhere, he entered into the Country of the Mantineans: being not without hope to do as Cleomenes had done to him; yet and perhaps to get the Lordship of Peloponnesus as having stronger friends, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantineia: where was fought between them a great battle. The Tyrant had brought into the Field upon Carts, a great many of Engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen sent forth his light Armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was fain to do the like. To second thereof, from the one and the other side came in continual supply: till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achaean and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the Fight: being so far advanced, each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned, which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made unserviceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Cannon is hindered from doing execution, in midst of the battels fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well observeth) by surmounting their hired Soldiers of Tyrants, exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppressed by Tyranny, since the one, by doing their best in fight, have hope to acquire somewhat beneficial to themselves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to assure their own servitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being partly paid with him in the fruits of his prosperity, have as good cause to maintain his quarrel as their own: whereas they that serve under a free State, have no other motive to do this, than a free State hath gotten the Victory, many companies (if not all) of foreign Auxiliaries are presently cait and therefore such good fellows will not take much pains to bring the War to an end. But the Victory of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers; because that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more Subjects; and therefore stands in fear of more, that should seek to take revenge upon him. The Highpriests of the Achaean, being forced to give ground, were urged so violently in their retreat by those of Machanidas; that shortly they betook themselves to flight: and could not be staid by any persuasions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battle of the Achaean. This disaster had been sufficient to have taken from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wisely observed the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore the Victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chase unto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battle his Lacedaemonians; whom he thought sufficient to deal with the Achaean, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of fight, Philopœmen advanced towards the Lacedaemonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Country, a long Ditch, without water at that time, and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedaemonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better Soldiers than the Achaean, who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battle; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Achaean, who drove them headlong into the Ditch again. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopœmen getting over the Ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chase, but retained with him sufficient strength, for the custody of a Bridge that was over the Ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chase, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet, with a lusty Troop of Horse about him, he made towards the Bridge: hoping to find the Achaean in disorder; and so to set upon their backs, as they were carefully pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopœmen ready to make good the Bridge against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the Ditch side; and searched an easy passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopœmen therefore leaving the charge of the Bridge unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode, and falling upon him at length in the Ditch itself, as he was getting over it, drew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battle on the Lacedaemonians side about four Thousand: and more than four Thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaean Mercenaries, probable it is, that the loss was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should have need.

SECT. VI.

Philip having Peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Lineages. Of the Galatians.

By this Victory the Achaens learned to think well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of War inferior to any, that should have brought against them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great use of them. But when he had once concluded Peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his Friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He took in hand many matters together, or very nearly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achaens would have done him service, they must by helping him to oppress those that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joy with the Romans and Ætolians in War against him.

This Attalus though a King, was scarce yet a Nobleman, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his father's virtue. His fortune began in Philistruus his Uncle: who being guided, by reason of a midship which he had when he was a Child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times repoted much confidence in Eunuchs, whose affections could not be obliged upon Wives or Children. He was entertained into the Family of Doimus, a Captain following Antigonum the first; and after the death of Antigonum, he accompanied his Master, that betook himself to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accounts. But when at length he stood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Town of Pergamus, and nine thousand Talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Town and Money, together with his own Service, he offered unto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to give Lysimachus his battle. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus, having slain Lysimachus, died shortly after himself, before he made use of Philistruus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is said to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before such time, they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Phileterus left his Kingdom to the elder of these, or to the Son of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the dissension between Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the Sons of the second Antiochus. He fought a battle with Hierax, near unto Sardis, and won the Victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that served under his Enemy, he used a pretty device. He wrote the word Victory upon the head of his South-layer, in such colours as would easily come off:

and when the hot liver of the Beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the Print of the Letters, He published this unto his Army as a Miracle, plainly foretelling that the gods would be assidant in that Battle.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadful enemy to Seleucus: who never durst attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a surfeit of over-much drink, and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was Son unto Attalus the youngest Brother of Phileterus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountiful, and no less valiant. By his own proper Forces he restored his Friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Achens: who setting up himself as King against Antiochus the Great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Tellæge, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, he recovered all that he had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they never wanted employment, but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters, or interposed themselves without invitation; and found themselves work in quarrels of their own making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his War against Bizantium: Whereunto when he had condescended; they nevertheless within a while after, invaded his Kingdom. He obtained against them a great Victory, and used it with great cruelty, sparing neither Age nor Sex. But the swarm of them increasing, they occupied the Region about Helyspont, where, in feating themselves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheless, presuming afterwards upon their strength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the sharp exaction whereof, they had no more respect unto Attalus, than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themselves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppress the weakest of their Neighbours, and to fill up the Armies of those that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the slothful reign of the Persians; or in the brutish times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atissa, sister unto the great King Cyrus, their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the Son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, oppressing his time while the Macedonians were at civil wars among themselves; recovered his Dominion, and passed it over to his off-spring. The King of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to have issued from the royal house of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians derived themselves from Pylmenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the war of Troy. These, applying themselves unto the times, were always conformable unto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reign in Bythynia, some few generations before that of the Great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonian way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the less molested. Calanitus, one of Alexander's Captains, made an expedition into their Country, where he was vanquished. They had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antigonum, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, until the reign of Prusias, whom we have already sometimes mentioned.

SECT. VII.

The Town of Chios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Prusias as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatness he suspected. He therefore strengthened himself, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary side, entered into a strict Confederacy with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian war, and was devising with Antiochus about sharing between them two the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolomy Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his son Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young child, his heir: the Bythynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come over into Asia, there to win the Town of the Ciani, and below it upon him. Prusias had no right unto the Town, nor just matter of quarrel against it: but it was fitly feared for him, and therefore rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But here, by he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst he lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: intreating him to forsake the enterprise. He gave dilatory, but otherwise gentle answers: making them as if he would have condescended to their request, when he intended nothing less. At length he got the Town: where, even in presence of the Embassadors, of whose solicitation he had seemed so regardful, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendered himself odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruel Prince. Especially his fact was detected of the Rhodians, who had made vehement intercession for the poor Ciani: and were advertised by Embassadors of purpose sent unto them from Philip. That howsoever it were in his power to win the Town as soon as he listed, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embassadors said, that he would manifest unto the world what honest tongues they were, which noised abroad such reports, as went of his falsehood and oppression. Whilst the Embassadors were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theatre to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had happened, shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Town of Chios, and after a cruel slaughter of the Inhabitants; had made slaves of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians took this in great despite, no less were the Ætolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captain to take charge of the Town; being warned before of his doings at Lys- machia and Chalcidæa (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own); what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moved with consideration of the Macedonian's violent ambition, and of his own estate. He had much to lose, and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong party in Greece. He had already, as a new King followed the example of Alexander's Captains, in purchasing with much liberality the love of the Æthiopiens; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens virtues, having lost their own. On the friendship of the Ætolians he had cause to presume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many and great, in their late war with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he easily drew into a straight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Upon confidence in these his friends, but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open war. It had been unreasonable to profane, and expect whereunto the doings of the enemy tended, since his desire to lessen upon Asia was manifest, and his falsehood no less manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a battle at Sea wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own Ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians took his death's wound: and though Philip after the battle took harbour upon a Promontory, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wrecks upon the shore: Yet so farforth as he had suffered far more greater loss of Ships and men, than had the enemy; and since he durst not in few days after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and won some Towns in Caria: whether once in a bravery; and to despight his opposites: or whether upon any hopeful desire of conquest, it is uncertain. The stratagem, by which he won Prinassus, is worthy of notice. He attempted it by a mine; and finding the earth so stony, that it resisted his work, he nevertheless commanded the Pioneers to make a noise underground; and secretly in the night time he raised great mounds about the entrance of the mine, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went marvelously forward. At length he sent word to the Towns-men, that by his undermining two acres of their wall stood only upon wooden props, to which if he gave fire, and entered by a Breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetched all his earthen rubbish by night a great way off, to raise up those heaps which they saw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the Mine. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be out-faced, and gave up the Town as lost, which the enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himself in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back unto Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

SECT. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, seek matters of quarrel against Philip. The Athenians upon slight cause, proclaim War against Philip; moved hitherto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Embassy. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

THESE Asiaticque matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet served well to make a noise in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making war in Macedonia, at least with a conceit that it were expedient to do. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries, and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonians, though long ofttimes and continual dealings in Greece ever since the reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding unto him, were nevertheless weary of him, by reason of his personal faults. All this gave hope, that the affairs of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the divisions of the Country were such, that every petty Estate was apt to take Council apart for it self, without much regarding the generality. But the poor Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republick all their money, neither had they as yet received, (neither did they receive until fifteen or sixteen years after this,) their whole sum back again. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present money, but much of it in Land: it beloveth them to rest a while; and below the more diligence in telling their grounds, by how much they were the less able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to solicit them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that solicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Islands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold war with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong, either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians; especially with the help of the Asiatics their good friends, and (in a manner) his own professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if only to predispose men unto the war, and give it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affairs of those that were more mighty than himself. He was too unskilful, or otherwise too unwary, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to have them; for he offered his help to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have strained his forces to the utmost in making war upon them; or in desisting from that injurious course, to have made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which of all other the most natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unless they think themselves justly provoked; was afterwards too fondly persuaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Covenants of peace between him and them. There is not any form of Oath, whereby such Articles of peace can be held inviolable, save only * by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessity: which will it binds one party, or both unto performance, making it apparent, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had a peace with Carthage; then was the River of Styx dried up: and then could they swear as * Mercury did in the Comedy, by their own selves, even by their good words, that they had good reason to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africa, and the present war against Attalus, were matter of quarrel as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took state upon them nevertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entering into the Temple of Ceres, in the days of Initiation (wherein were delivered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainly said to be available unto felicity after this life) discovered themselves by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the officers: and though it was apparent, that they came in to the place by mere error, not thinking to have therein done amiss; yet as it had been for some heinous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and sought to revenge it as a publick injury, by war upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entered into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignity stirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more, than they had ability to perform. All which at the present they could do, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happy success against Philip, and intreating him to visit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing, because he understood that the Roman Embassadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians, Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoicing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being no less glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their City, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as solemn a pomp as they could devise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himself they flattered, could suggest. At his first coming into the City, they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them hear him speak. But he excused himself, saying: That with an evil grace he should recount unto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliver in writing, what he would have propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were: first, what he had willingly done for their sake; then, what had lately passed between him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonians, whilst he with the Rhodians and the Romans were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to do, he protested, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help. There needed little intreaty: for they were as willing to proclaim the war, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained. That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their courage; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noise of war, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while these were vainly mispending the time, in seeking to draw the Asiatics to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip won the Towns of Maronea and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing over the Hellespont, he laid siege unto Abydos, and won it, though he was fain to stay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it self against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither only one Geadirime Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men, far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embassadors wondered much at this great negligence of them that had taken so much upon them.

These Embassadors, C. Claudius, M. Emilius, and P. Sempontius, were sent unto Ptolemy Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their Victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his favour unto them shewed in that War; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his reign, which (as his father Ptolemy had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courtier for which the Romans were to thank him, was that out of Egypt

they had lately been supplied with corn, in a time of extreme dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This message could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Council for him, should offer to supply the Romans with corn: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no less than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementary, so had the Embassadors both leisure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed that M. Emilius, the youngest of them should step aside, and visit Philip, to try if he could make him leave the siege of Abydos; which else he was like to carry. Emilius, coming to Philip, tells him that his doings was contrary to the League, that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydos, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependency upon Attalus. Hereunto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made War upon him; and that he did only require them with the like. Do you also (said Emilius) repeat these poor Abydeni with such terrible War, for any like Injustice by them first made upon you? The King was angry to hear himself thus taken short: and therefore he roundly made answer to Emilius: It is your youth, Sir, and your beauty, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I wish you to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: If ye do otherwise, I will make ye understand, that the Kingdom, and Name of Macedonia is in matter of War, no less noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his direction. The people had entertained a resolution, to have died every one of them, and let their Town on fire; binding themselves hereto by a fearful oath when Philip denied to accept them upon reasonable conditions. But having in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth; it was thought meet by the Governors and Ancients of the City, to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip; about which, whilst they were busy, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort, that, by exhortation of the Priest, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that he said, he would grant the Abydeni three days leisure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the Town; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad souls.

SECT. IX.

The Romans decree War against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THIS calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it nearly resembled: though Rome was not alike interceded in the quarrel. But to help themselves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the City of Athens: which if the Macedonian should win, then rested there no more to do, than that he should presently embark himself for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five months; but in the short space of five days saying. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africa; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome indeed to believe, that this War with the Macedonian was both just and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hastened away toward Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readiness, by order from the Senate: who followed other Motives than the people must be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embassadors, of their constancy (as was said) in not changing their faith at such times as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not upon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to think it a benefit unto themselves: that any Greek Town refusing to sue unto the Macedonian for peace, requested their help against him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Eastern parts, had reason to give thanks unto those, that ministered the occasion. Since therefore it was an untrue suggestion, "That Philip was making ready for Italy:" and since neither Attalus the Rhodian, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to give them protection: these bullic-headed Athenians: who falling out with the Acanthians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was showed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, even to Ptolemy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours: but be accepted as cause of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheless as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence; the doings of P. Sulpicius the Consul were such, as might have argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He failed not about Peloponnesus; but took the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of

Apfus, between Dyrhacium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him and craved his help: whereof they could make no benefit which he was far from them. They besmoaned themselves as men besieged, and intricated him to deliver them. For which cause he sent unto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces be retained with him, for the protection of a greater design. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: only some Rovers from Chalcis, in the Isle of Eubœa, and some bands of adventures out of Gorinth used to take their Ships, and spoil their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Towns. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrival of Claudius, and shortly after, of three Æolian Gallies, easily preserved them. As for the Athenians themselves, they that had been wont, in ancient times to undertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus and Cicil; to make War upon Philip, which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as also the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africa; to shew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. Philip returning home from Abyden; heard news of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well-considered, whether it were best a while to sit still, and see what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: he received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap: there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius, with his Romans, finding no such work at Athens, as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own employment better. He grew soon weary of sitting as a Scare-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoil, and therefore

Philip returning home from Abyden; heard news of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well-considered, whether it were best a while to sit still, and see what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Invaders with all his forces: he received advertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap: there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius, with his Romans, finding no such work at Athens, as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own employment better. He grew soon weary of sitting as a Scare-crow, to save the Athenians grounds from spoil, and therefore gladly took in hand a business of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Soldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Towns-men, who supposed themselves upon their Garrison. Herodotus Claudius having advertisement, failed thither by night, for fear of being detected: and arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He used no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it, (unless he should have left the heartless Athenians to their own defence) he set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all provisions for War, which were plentifully filled. Neither were he and his Associates contented with the great abundance of Spoil which they carried aboard their Ships, and with enlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of much security, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despite and hatred unto the King, they overthrew, and break in pieces the Statues in him there erected. This done, they halted away towards Athens: where the news of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about some 20 miles thence; whither then these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haste to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their trusty Friends, bulic at work in ransacking the Town, and loading themselves with spoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thousand light-armed Foot he had with him, and three hundred Horse: whereof leaving Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not impossible to take his Enemies in joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the City upon the Borders, had not detected him afar off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Town asleep, as fearless of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing this report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadel to sound the Alarm, and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there; who seeing the many lights, and other signs of bulic preparation usual in such a case, understood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius was not yet returned (who was to fetch a compass about by Sea, and had no cause of haste) yet having in the Town some mercenary Soldiers, which they kept of their own, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventure to issue forth at a Gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his own, that were thus hasty. He therefore only willed his men to follow his example; and presently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave singular proof of his valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drove them with great slaughter back into the City. The heat of his courage transported him further than discretion would have allowed, even to the very Gate. But he retired without harm taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the Gate, could not use their casting weapons against him, without much endangering their own people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Heracles, a place of exercise, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments besides, near adjoining unto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the Sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time to prevent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Acheans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Acheans were devising upon War: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started up in the room of Machabius, did greater mischief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his Mercenaries; and of his Subjects had no regard. He was a cruel oppressor, a greedy extortioner upon those that lived under him: and one that in his natural condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apgea was very fitly matched with him, since his dexterity was no greater in spoiling the men, then hers in fleeing their wives; whom he would never suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their Jewels and Apparel. Her Husband was so delighted with her property, that he caused an Image to be made, lively representing her; and apparelled it with rich costly garments, as the used to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, serving to torment men. Herodotus made use, when he meant to try the virtue of his Rhetoric. For calling unto him some rich man, of whose money he was desirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apgea stood, and there use all his art of persuasion, to get what he desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speed, but was answered with excuses; then took he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apgea (who fate by in a Chair) could persuade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that rose up and opened the Arms, as it were for imbracment. Those arms were full of sharp iron nails, the like whereof was also flicking in the Breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she gripped the poor wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruel death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Æthians, as Machabius and Lycurgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopæmen virtue he stood in fear: and therefore durst not provoke the Acheans, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cyclades, a far worse Captain, was their Prætor, and all, or the greater part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philopæmen being alone gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of War; then did Nabis fill up with their Territory, and wasting all the Fields, made them disfruit their own safety in the Towns.

Against this Tyrant the Acheans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them, and had set down what proportion of Soldiers every City

City of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip will'd them not to trouble themselves with the care of this business, forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this War, and take the burden upon himself. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That whilst he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns ungarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Isle of Eubœa; so that he might securely pursue the War against Nabis. Immediately they found out his device; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in this War against the Romans. Wherefore their Pretor Cyclades made him answer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which they were assembled. So passing the Decree, upon which he agreed before, for preparing War against Nabis, he brake up the Assembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former time, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpose with the Acheans. Nevertheless, he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries, and so returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philetes one of his Captains, that with two thousand men had been doing what harm he might unto the Country. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyreus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into every of these places; that he could no more wreak his anger upon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So he destroyed all the works of their noble Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble, which were had in plenty of their own; or having long ago been Masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did he only put all down: but caused his men to break the very Stones, that they might be unseizable to their reparation. His loss at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made provision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad Neighbours, which were likely to infect him. Among other his cares, he forgot not the Ætolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassy, requesting them to continue in his Friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped upon the River of Aspis. Thence he sent forth Aspinus his Lieutenant, with part of the Army to wait the borders of Macedon. Aspinus took sundry Castles and Towns, using such extremity of Sword and Fire at Antipatria, the first good Town, which he won by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, unless they knew themselves able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoil, he was charged in the River, upon the passage of a brook, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these Enemies, took Prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arrived in safety at their Camp. The success of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet served to draw into the Roman friendship those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Phlebas, the Son of Serdalides; the Illyrian: Amintander King of the Atthamians; and Eato the Son of Longurus, Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance unto the Consul, who thanked them; and said, That he would shortly make use of Phlebas and Eato, when he entered into Macedon: but that the friendship of Amintander, whose Country lay between the Ætolians and Thessaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to fight them up against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadors from the Macedonian, Roman, and Athenian. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of Peace between his Master and the Ætolians; so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves, with our good cause to be carried away after other mean fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore, had made shew, as if their War in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making Peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so wise, in obtruding their protection upon those that needed it not? Surely it was even the general hatred, which these Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For when after the same sort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants; but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew such matters into Greece, must not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to consult about War and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three years ago made the Peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who sought to break it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these objections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speak next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudency in the Macedonian Ambassador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians; knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few days past, made War upon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Here-with they made a pitiful rehearsal of their own calamities: and said, that if Philip might have his will, Attica, and all the rest of Greece, should feel the same that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens itself, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman Arms had not defended them. Then

Then spake the Romans: who exclaiming, as well as they could, their own oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the work in hand. They said, that they had of late made War in the Ætolian behalf, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made Peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselves, by alleging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to give them aid convenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their War and Victory, unless they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceived, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselves carried unto the War by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to help those Friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Pretor, shifted them off a while with a dilatory answer: though he told his Country-men, That by relieving themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in general terms; That over-much haste was an enemy to good counsel: for which cause they must deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming nearer to the matter in hand, he passed a Decree, That the Pretor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise, it was unlawful to treat of such affairs, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

SECT. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to hear that the Romans had sped no better in their Solicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great help and meant himself to disappoint them of another. His Son Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Straights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians; having with him some of the Kings Council, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may seem, that the presence of the Kings Son, how young soever, would both encourage his Followers, and terrify the Enemies, by making them at least believe, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few years before this, was in like manner left upon the Borders of Ætolia by his Father; who earnest business called thence another way. No danger of Enemies being left on either hand; it was thought that the Macedonian Fleet under Heracleides, would serve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodian and Roman, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his Journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Dolopetii, a people in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North, until they join in the South with Pindus, inclose the Western parts of Macedon. Two or three days they lay in sight one of the other, without making offer of battle. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Camp into the open Field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to fend forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his Horse, to entertain them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was so, that the King was unwilling to hazard all at first upon a Call, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his own Forces: yet being no less unwilling to lose too much in reputation; he made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers; and so gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and his Targettiers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him so hotly, that they drove him to a hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targettiers, not flaying to let them run into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made fruitless the work to which they were appointed. The Consul being gathered, that the King had some desire to try the fortune of a battle: which he therefore presented the second time: leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the Front: a kind of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken those of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by time. It was scarce above fourscore years ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to fright the Romans, who had never seen any of those Beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) came into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Consul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely: for the Romans had greater need to fight than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so near the Enemy, that was strong in Horse, send his men to fetch in Corn out of the Fields. Wherefore he removed 8 miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground: and so the more boldly he suffered his Foragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing sorry of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: even till their presumption, and his own supposed fear, should make them careless. When this was come to pass, he took all his Horse, and light-armed Foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, between the Foragers and their Camp. There he layed in Cover with part of his Forces, to keep the passages that none should escape. The rest he sent abroad the Country, to fall upon the

stragglers: willing them to put all to the Sword, and let none home with the news to the Camp. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scour the Fields, lighted all or most of them upon the King and his Companies in their flight: So as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great multitude. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his Horse, and bids them help their fellows where they saw it needful: He himself with the Legions followed. The Companies of Horse divided themselves, accordingly as they were with advertisements upon the way, into many parts, not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvassing the Field, took their task where they found it: But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himself; They had the disadvantage as coming fower, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away as their fellows also might have been, if the King had well be thought himself, and given over in time. But while, not contented with such an Harvest, he was too greedy about a poor gleaming; the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their Horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own safety. They ran which way they could: and (as men that he in wait for others, are seldom heedful of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way: so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogs, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings Horse was slain under him: and there had been castaway, if a loving Subject of his had not alighted, mounted him upon his own Horse, and delivered him out of peril, at the expense of his own life, that running on Foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with inprovident rashness; and the Consul with as much dulness, for his days service. A little longer stay would have delivered the King from these Enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set upon his Camp, at such time as he fled thither, half amazed with either being slain or taken, they might have won it. But that noble Historian Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciously observed, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this days work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay safe in his Camp; and could not be so afflicted with the loss of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himself, he was advertised, that Plenatus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen upon his Country: when they found the passage thereto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Stragglers. This was it which made him adventure to do somewhat betimes; that he might see the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards look unto his troublesome Neighbours. In consideration of this Philip was desirous to clear himself of the Romans, as soon as he might. And to that purpose he sent unto the Consul: requesting a day of Truce for burial of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by Night, and left Fires in his Camp to beguile the Enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of fireing, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down Trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little use; being a square battle of Pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more serviceable in that case. But they were few; and their Arrows were of small force against the Roman Shields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of Stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This Victory (such as it was) laid open unto the Consul some poor Towns thereabout, which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for fear. But the spoil of these, and of the Fields adjoining, was not sufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themselves apace out of the Country. The King sent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whilst he himself went against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had relieved himself and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again: as also that Plenatus and the Dardaniens were fallen upon Illyria; grew no less busy on the side, than before he had been wife. He persuaded his Nation to take their time: and for, not flying to post him War, joined his Forces with Antiochus the Syrian; and made invasion upon Thessaly. They took, and cruelly sacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they listed. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Antiochus more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his own mountainous Country.

About the same time the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewise the Town of Oreum in the Isle of Æubæa: and some other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly been made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans; and the People for Slaves. Other attempts on that side were hindered: either by foul weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of means.

SECT.

SECT. XII.

Vilius the Roman Consul wasts a year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An Ambassador of the Romans to Carthage, Malanissa and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintus Flaminius is sent against him.

Thus the time ran away: and P. Vilius a new Consul, took charge of the War in Macedonia. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldest Soldiers: whereof two thousand, having served long in Sicily and Africa, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not be suffered to look unto their own Estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had served at Cannæ: as may seem by their complaint, of having been long absent from Italy: whither fain they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Vilius dealt with them, it is uncertain. For the History of his year is lost; whereof the miss is not great, since he did nothing memorable. Valerius indeed, as we find in Livie, hath adorned this Vilius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Livie himself, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Author: we may reasonably believe, that Vilius his year was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gauls. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and strong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had been able to force: was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Crenona was attempted: but saved her self, taking warning by her Neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that stayed behind Asdrubal, or Mago in those parts: was now become Captain of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giving them to understand, That if they were not weary of the Peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up, these their Citizen Amilcar, who made War in Italy: Hercuto it was added (perhaps left the message might seem otherwise to have favoured a little of some fear) That of the fugitive slaves belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walk up and down to Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be reformed back to their Masters: as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Malanissa, as also with Vermina the Son of Syphax. Unto Malanissa, besides matter of Compliment, they were to signify what pleasure he might do them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serve in their War against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe unto him the name of King; and promised thereafter to deserve it, by his readiness in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter, and said, That having been, and being still (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought first of all to deliver Peace; for that the name of King, was an honour that they used not to confer upon any.

save only upon such as had royally deserved it at their hands. The authority to make Peace with him, was wholly committed unto these Embassadors, upon such terms as they should think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People: For they were then bulled with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitives, they had reformed as many as they could find; and would in that point, as far as was requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithal they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Malanissa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadors, to give them entertainment, on the Borders of his Kingdom; and without any dispute, agreed with them upon terms of Peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gauls, they laid siege unto Crenona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor, came upon them, fought a battle with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battle: and the fruit of the Victory was such, both made amend for losses past, and left the work easy to those, that afterwards should have the managing of War among those Gauls. So there was good leisure to think upon the business of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellor whom they hated: as also to assure unto himself the Acheans, by rendering unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not only by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thence into out of Epirus. This was in doing when Vilius, having unprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a Journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with Victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintus Flaminius was chosen Consul, and that Macedon allotted him for his Province; whose coming he expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

SECT. XIII.

The Romans begin to make War by Negotiation. T. Quintus wins a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans and Ætolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A Treaty of Peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

The Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battle to the Enemy, as soon as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Towns: and so forced him to try the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborn it (as it would be intercepted) upon knowledge of his own weakness. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learn of the subtle Greeks, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not grown so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and stood indebted, many years after this into private men, for part of those moneys that had been borrowed in the second Punick War. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian War; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprise, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their business went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the less need to rely upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latinæ) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other means could well have served, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Army; but by framing themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the succulence of those that are too many and too far from home) have bred some jealousie in their friends of their enemies, more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite, for that Attalus, about the same time, exulted himself unto them by his Embassadours, requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom, against Antiochus who invaded it; or else that they would not take it unconsciously; that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which most concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to use the aid of their friends, longer then their friends had good opportunity, and could also be well contented to afford it: That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend, though he were against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) do their best to persuade an atonement between them. In such loving fashion did they now carry themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus, who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded these terms of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soon appear.

T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the supply decreed unto him; which consisted for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had served in Spain and Africk. He found Vilius the old Consul, whom at his coming he presently discharged; and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Asper, or Dons. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seek their way into Macedon, or else win, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together mis-spent their time, and been forced to return back without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over these Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentiful Country; and, which by long dependence on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Asper running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Marish and impassable bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main rock by mans hand, wherefore Quintius assailed to climb in the Mountains: but finding himself disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very eafie; he was compelled to fill fill, without doing any thing for the space of forty days.

This long time of rest gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by composition, upon some reasonable terms. He therefore to deal with some of the Epirians, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would have him to let all Towns of Greece at liberty, and make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to those whom he had subdued of late; but unto such, as had been long subject unto him and his Ancestors. He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claim and dominion over them. He also said, that as far forth as it should appear that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatsoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seem convenient in the judgement of some free State, that had not been interested in those quarrels. But herewithal Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no judgement or compromise, so much as it was apparent that Philip had always been the invader; and had not made War as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would have to be set at liberty, the first that he named were the Thessalians: These had been subjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever since the days of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soon as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded what sharper condition he would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquished. And herewithal abruptly he flung away: refusing to hear any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul strove in vain two or three days together, to have prevailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himself, and could not resolve what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man sent from Choronea a Prince of the Epirians that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beasts in those Mountains, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertook to guide the Romans without any danger, to a place where they should have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and being promised a great reward, in case he made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night, it being then about the full of the Moon) and rested in the day time, for fear being discovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonian, (though undiscovered by them, because by their banks) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gave notice of their success unto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on the journey, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian, thereby to avert him from the thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as near as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and assailed them in their strength. He prevailed as little as in former times, until the shoutings of those that ran down the hill, and charged Philip on the back, astonished to the Macedonians, that they betook themselves unto flight. The King, upon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to save himself. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: he made a stand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest loss was of his Camp and provisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation: for that now the Macedonians began to stand in fear, left being driven from a place of such advantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himself much better perwaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hands he could he could visit, to forsake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoiling all the rest. But all of them could not be perwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better do, for that he could not stay to use any great compulsion. He also himself took it very grievously, for that he was driven to make such waste of a so pleasant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him: so that a little hindrance did serve, to make him break off his purpose, and withdraw himself home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Atbamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readiness to invade Thessaly; whereinto the ways lay more open out of their several Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they forebore not the occasion, but made all speed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their harvest, could not find enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poor Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few days since had made them to be very desirous, waited by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turn themselves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius won Phaleria by assault: Menopolis and Pirra yielded unto him. Rhage he besieged; and having made a fair breach, yet was unable to force it: so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, having somewhat recoiled his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, having well near spent his victuals, and seeing no hope to prevail at Rhage: brake up his liege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his Ships of burden to meet him at Antiochia, an Haven Town of Phocia, on the Gulf of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred unto the people, as because it lay conveniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had business, or was shortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocia he won by assault: many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within short space he had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the mean time L. Quintius the Consul brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward laid siege unto Cenchreæ, an Haven and Arceval of the Corinthians on their Eastern Sea. This enterprise did somewhat help forward the Acheans, in their desire to leave the part of Philip; since it might come to pass, that Corinth itself, ere long might be spent; and that Cenchreæ, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Acheans to prefer the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereof they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many ways offended them in time of peace, that they thought it best counsell to rid their hands of him, whilst being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsel as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himself their absolute Lord: his poisoning of Aratus their old Governour: his false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his own dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed: could them long since to hold him as a necessary evil, even whilst they were unable to be without his assistance. But since by the virtue of Philopomenus, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength: so as without the Macedonian help they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they only think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It annoyed him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers to take away the life of * Philopomenus, ^{*Plat. in c. Philopom.} But failing in this enterprise; and being detected, he did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was thoroughly dry before, and prepared to burn.

Philopomenus wrought so with the Acheans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycliades, a principal man among them: and lately their Pretor, was expelled by them, for shewing himself passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristeus chosen Pretor, who laboured to joyn them in society with the Romans.

These news were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Acheans making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them if they would forsake the Macedonians. A Parliament of the Acheans was held at Syein, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty cause. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Acheans to join with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwise the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for his builings, admonishing the Acheans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him, requested them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadors did no way advance their Masters cause. Rather it gave the Acheans to understand, That he, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himself unable to gratify them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Council, who remembering the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memory of those old good turns, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold unto them, and partly had used as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance, That the Romans were strong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed. That they should thence-forward renounce, the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodiens they forthwith entered into society; with the Romans (because no League would be of force, until the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any society at the present, until the return of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonians, as by many respects they were bound, rose up out of the Council, and departed before the passing of the Decree; which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty there-to give assent. For this their good will, and gratitude, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thanks, that all the rest of the Acheans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it self so plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his hands, if they might have any small alliance. Philoetes a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans, and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos, whither coming on a sudden, and finding the multitude ready to join with him, he easily compelled the Achean Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and some other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtain some good end by Treaty, whilst as yet with his honour he might seek it: and when if the Winter began now come on) a new Council would shortly be chosen, who should take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect unto himself; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to pre-dispose things unto a conclusion, for his own reputation;

The meeting was appointed to be held upon the Sea-shore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulf of Zeuos, in the Aegean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Animander the Avthamian; an Embassador of Attalus; the Admiral of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Aetolians and Acheans. Philip had with him some few of his own Captains, and Cycliadas, lately banished for his sake out of Achæa. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods: yet misdoubting some treachery in the Aetolians. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans, were, That he should let all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewise whatsoever he held of theirs in Thyria; and whatsoever about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death Attalus demanded restitution to be made, entire of Ships, Towns, and Temples by him taken and spoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodiens would have again the Country of Perea, lying over against their Island, as also that he should withdraw his garrisons out of divers Towns about the Hellespont, and other Havens of their friends. The Acheans desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjustly, quarrel with him: the other had been long his own by their consent. The Aetolians took upon them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even to the whole Country, leaving it free; and withall to deliver up unto them, whatsoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithall content: but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessaly: corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by destroying, when he was vanquished, those Towns, which else they might have gotten. To answer these malapert Aetolians, Philip commanded his Gallies to be rowed nearer the shore. But they began to plice him afresh: telling him that he must obey his betters, unless he were able to defend himself by force of Arms. He answered (as he was much given to jibing) with sundry scoffs, and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul understand what manner of companions these Aetolians were. For he said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greeks; desiring them to abrogate a wicked law, which permitted them to take spoil from spoil: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Attalus out of Attolia. Titus wondered what might be the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custom, as often as War happened between their friends, to hold up the quarrel, by sending Voluntaries to serve on both sides, that should spoil both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he said it was strange, that the Aetolians should be so careful thereof, since divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Greeks: wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make slaves of those Aetolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat smiled, and was no whit offended, to hear the Aetolians well rattled up, touching whom he began to understand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of setting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well seem that greatness of the Romans; though he would also consider, what might seem his own dignity. But that the Aetolians, Rhodiens, and other petty Estates, should thus presume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might he should be thenceunto compelled: it was, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Acheans he charged with much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their own; wherein they loaded both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheless, he said, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himself. Thus he addressed himself wholly to the Roman General; unto whom if he could give satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodiens, his late War (he said) was only defensive, they having been the offenders: or if he gave them any occasion, it was only in helping Perseus, his Son-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that spoiling a Temple of Pennus, he had cut down the Grove, and pleasant walks thereabouts: what could he do more, than send Gardners thither with young Plants, if one King of another would stand to ask such recompense? Thus he jested the matter out: but offered nevertheless, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Perea to the Rhodiens; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that days conference, because it was late: Philip requesting a Nights leisure to think upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Council, wherewith to advise about them. For your being so ill provided of Council (said Titus) you may even thank your self, as having murdered all your Friends, that were wont to advise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late night; excusing his long stay by the weightiness of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was believed, that he thereby sought to abridge the Aetolians of leisure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in private with the Roman General. The sum of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Acheans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodiens, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians, that he would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoever they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendered up. The noise that they made came to Philips ear: who thereupon desired a third day of meetings, and protested, that if he could not persuade them, he would offer himself to be perwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken unto good offers of Peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions which he had already tendered; or otherwise, that they would make Truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadors to Rome, where he would refer himself to the courtship of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it: who flood in doubt, left a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour which he expected by ending of the War. So he easily prevailed with the rest to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for service in the War; and since, without authority of the Senate, he should be unable to proceed resolutely either in War or Peace. Further, he willed them to send their several Embassadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the rest, he perswaded King Animander to make a Journey to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadors, would serve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reasons which they alleged unto the Senate.

The Embassadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of Victory than Satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in undertaking to let Greece at liberty. But this (they said) could never be effected: unless especial care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in servility, that the Senate agreed to have it so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration: they were briefly cut off in the midst of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yield up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had given them no direction or commission what to say or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of Peace: wherein they said he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadors have truly said, That neither the Aetolians, Acheans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any claim to either of those Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Acheans had some right (though their right were no better, than that, having stolen it from one Macedonian King in a Night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain unto another) Philip had already condescended to give it back unto them. And this perhaps would have been alleged, even against the Greeks, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his Friends; that so he might have had honour to conclude the War, if a success had been decreed unto him. But since he was appointed to continue General: neither his Friends at Rome, nor he himself, after the return of the Embassadors unto Greece, cared to give ear unto any talk of Peace.

Philip seeing that his Acheans had forsaken him, and joined with their common Enemies, thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himself unto Nabis, whom they hated

most. There were not many years past, since the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help than their own strength, had been almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Acheans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though styling himself King. Yet he sorely vexed the Acheans: and therefore seemed to Philip, one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be conveyed over into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serve to tie him fast unto the Lacedæmonians. Philoctetes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, that it was his Masters purpose to make a freight alliance with the Lacedæmonians, by giving some Daughters of his own in Marriage unto Nabis his Sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Town of Argos; unless by decree of the Citizens themselves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philoctetes dealt with the Argives: but found them to averre, that, in open Affection of the People, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occasion, to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philoctetes, without more ado, to make over the Town, which he was ready to receive. Philoctetes accordingly did let him with his Army into it by Night; and gave him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forsaken the Acheans to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himself master of all the Gates. A few of the principal men, understanding how things went, fled out of the City at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chief Citizens that stayed behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Also a great imposition of money was laid upon all those that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more ado. But if any stood long upon the matter; or played the Thieves in purchasing their own Goods: they were put to the whip; and besides loss of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Laws; namely, such as might serve to make him gracious with the rascal multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the lands of the rich among the poor. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath been an old custom of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soon as Nabis had gotten Argos, he sent the news to T. Quintius and others to join with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he took the pains to cross over the Straights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soon agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cavil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, six hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as was also agreed with the Acheans, upon a Truce for four months, reserving the final conclusion of Peace between them, until the War of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

SECT. XIV.

The Battle at Cynoscephala, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soon as he understood that he was appointed to have command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the will and pleasure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent pursuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of Peace, and no less failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to be his friend in that War, meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himself. Nabis had in his Army about six and twenty thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Only Titus heard that Philip was in Thessaly, and thereupon addressed himself to seek him out. They had like to have met unawares, near unto the City of Phæria: where the vantage-grounds on both sides discovered each other; and sent news of them were over-hasty to commit all to hazard upon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better discovery. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their several Camps, with little advantage unto either side. The Country about Phæria was thick set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and Mud-walls; which made it improper for the service of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King, dislodged, intending to remove back into Sostyla, in the Frontier of Macedonia; where he might be plentifully served with all necessities. Titus conceived aright his meaning; and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards: were it only to waste the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of Hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other took. Nevertheless they encamped not far asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them understood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take up his lodging by chance. Then sent they forth discoverers again, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the work. But Philip anon fell in such strong supply, that if the resistance of the Ætolians had not been desperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonian prevailed: so that Titus himself was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battle in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might thereupon depend. But the news came to him thick and tumultuously, how the Enemies fled, and how the day was his own, if he could use an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: inasmuch as he embattled his men; and climbed up those Hills, which, for that the knots thereon had some resemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynoscephala. As soon as he was on the

Hill-

Hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his own light armature were built in fight, almost at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so far. He had also liberty to choose his ground, as might serve best his advantage; forasmuch as the Romans were driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great use: the roughness of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, serving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheless he found convenient room, wherein to marshal the one part of his Army; and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the rest, embattelling them as they might. Whilst he was doing this, he perceived that his Horse-men and light Armature began to think; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoil. He sets forward to help them: and they no less hastily draw unto him for succour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climb the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their Pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extremely difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx being a great square battle of armed Pikes, like in all points to those which are now used in our modern Wars: and being in like manner used, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it self held together undissolved. The Macedonians were embattled in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the Pikes of the first ranks had their points advanced two or three Foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvel if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with ten enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen Foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it, was greatly troubled: for that the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he observed, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevenness of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) upon the side either of beholding the palinode, or of coming to be partakers in the work, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder he made great and present use. He caused the right wing of his battle to march up the Hill against their ill-ordered Troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terror. The Macedonians were ready to dispute what should be done in such a case: than well advised what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they should have done their best, it could not have served; since the ground whereon they stood, made their Weapons unuseful. For let it be supposed, that Philip having six and twenty thousand in his Army (as he is said to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thousand Horse, four thousand Targettiers, and four thousand light-armed: so shall there remain fourteen thousand Pikes: whereof himself had embattled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is now ready to charge. The Phalanx having usually sixteen in File, mult, when it consisted of seven thousand, have well-near four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would serve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or seven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polibius doth, to every man of them three foot of ground: this Front must have occupied twelve hundred Foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very near a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaign, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disjoin this close battle of the Phalanx, was not every where to be found. Here at Cynoscephala Philip had so much room, as would only suffice for the one half of his men's the rest were fain to stand still and look about them, being hindered from putting themselves in order, by the roughness of the Dogs-heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in mauling those Enemies, whose Feet were in a manner bound by the disproportion of the place. The very stiff impression of the Elephants, caused them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to break themselves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, seeing the Victory on that part assured, left the prosecution of it unto others; and being followed by twenty Ensigns or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helped to making of the Victory complete. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on so far, as that himself with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rear. The hindermost ranks of the Phalanx, and of all them indeed, gave the first five, were accustomed, when the battels came to jockeying, to carry their Pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies, to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it served neither for offence nor defence, except only in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mapopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the four sides of it were as so many Fronts to look sundry ways, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be understood, that herein he altered the usual form; as also at the same time he embattled his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turn their weapons which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexander men being thus disposed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the Enemy, unless their hindmost ranks could have marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such provision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise unable to help themselves, threw down their weapons and fled. The King himself that thought until now, that the fortune of the battle was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noise behind him, and turning a little aside with a Troop of Horse, to see how all went; when he beheld his men casting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he presently betook himself to flight. Neither did he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this overthrow) until he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battle, about seven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slain; and five thousand taken Prisoners.

SECT. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants Truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the Peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

THE Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themselves, and desired to have it noised through all Greece, that the Victory at Cyncephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the booty by facking the Macedonian Camp, whilst the Romans were builed in the chafe. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous conditions; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his confederates in Greece: who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battle, Titus made haste unto Larissa, a City in Thessaly, which he presently took. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burn all his Letters, and passages whatsoever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much adversity, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his Friends. Yet by thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we find not that they, or any of their Neighbours, did make delay of opening their Gates to Titus. At the same time, the Town of Leucas, bordering upon Arcanania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very soon after, all the Arcanians, a war-like Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip, gave up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the Victory at Cyncephale. The Rhodians were also then in hand with the Conquest of Peres, a Region of the Continent over against the Island; whereof they had demanded restitution in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly than any other of the Greeks: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and some help which they borrowed of the Acheans, and other their Friends, gave battle to Demetrius the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the Victory, and consequently recovered the whole Province. It enraged Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdom; wasting and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all haste of 6000 Foot, and 500 Horse: where-with coming upon them, he drove them, with little or no loss of his own, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprize he had success answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affairs, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yield unto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limeus and Demophanes, with Cycliades the banished Achean, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadors unto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seems that they had Commission, to refer all unto Titus his discretion; as Philip himself in few days after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen days: in which time, the King himself might come and speak with the Roman General. In the mean season, many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greek his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chief Authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honesty, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent Letters unto his Associates; willing them that they have Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should be held. There when they were all Assembled, they entered into Consultation before the Kings arrival, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every fate in particular. The poor King Aminander besought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and considering his weakness, which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him, who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commended Titus, forasmuch as he had thus assembled the Confederates to advise upon their own good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpose, which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making Peace with Philip, he could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the War, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the fair promises made by Titus himself unto the Greeks, than the chafing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect, he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customs which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seek the utter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made War with them, until by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he ledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That Victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece, it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedon should be greatly weakened, and brought low: not that it should utterly be destroyed: forasmuch as it served as a bar to the Thracians, Gauls, Gauls, and a multitude of other salvage Nations which would soon over-flow the whole continent of Greece, if this Kingdom were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yield unto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reason to deny him Peace. As for the Ætolians, if they thought otherwise, it should be at their own pleasure, to take Counsel apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phanias, another of the Ætolians, to say, that all was come to nothing: for that ere long, Philip would rouble all the Greeks, no less than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bade him leave his babblings: saying, That himself would take such order, as that Philip, were he never so desirous, should thenceforth not have it in his power to molest the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus used friendly: and suffering him to repose himself that Night, held a Counsel the day following: wherein the King yielded unto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further, to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phanias the Ætolian, insulting over him, said, It was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of Towns, (which he there named) bidding him speak whether he would or no. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himself, said, it should be otherwise. These were Thessalonian Towns, and should be all free; one of them only excepted, which not long ago had refused to commit it self to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phanias cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the Towns that had sometimes belonged unto their Commonwealth. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the Towns taken ought to be to their own, and the Romans to have nothing save the Pillage and Captives. It is true, that there had been such a condition in the former War: but it ceased to be of any validity, as soon as the Ætolians made Peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to understand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be delivered into subjection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted with these angry passages between the Romans and the Ætolians: neither had they great reason to fear any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in the behalf of those Ætolians, to give them liberty, though they had stood out against him, even till very fear made them open their Gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselves; but gave their consent willingly unto a Truce for four Months.

The chief cause that moved Titus to grant Peace so readily to the Macedonians, besides that laudable custom by him before alleged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Army from Syria, and drawing near toward Euphrat. He had also perhaps yet a greater motive; even the consideration that his success might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his Letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonians, and sundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Counsels were chosen: who (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the Peace; alleging frivolous matter of their own suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded; and the Letters of Titus, pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side, and the importunity of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shows were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as soon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People; by whose foreign authority it was concluded, that Peace should be granted to the King. So ten Embassadors were sent from Rome, over into Greece: in which number were they that had been Consuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus should go through with the business of Peace. These would very vain have retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcedon, and Demetrius, until the estate of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally, Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered unto the Ætolians, as well in the other Greek Towns which Philip held, and all in Asia as in Greece, referred unto liberty.

The Conditions of Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next ^{* Excerpt. 3} Ithimian Games, he should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greek Towns which he held, and confine them over to the Romans: That he should deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's. Likewise all his Ships of War, reserving to himself only five of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatness, wherein sixteen men laboured at every Oar: Further, that he should pay a thousand Talents, the one half in hand, the other in ten years following, by even portions. Hereto ^{+ Liv. 43} Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make War out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I find not that he observed this Article: or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred Talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger Son Demetrius, to remain as Hostage for his true dealing in this matter of Peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the Money, and his Son, should be restored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand Talents, I cannot find; and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with these four hundred Talents, was given for Hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus unto Frangis King of Bithynia: giving him to understand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Ciani, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip, to gratify this Bithynian his Son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these Letters wrought, it was not greatly material; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise, that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Philip to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themselves aggrieved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Ætolians continued to favour the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble unto themselves. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans; who, seeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus, saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had born unto him; unless at this time, when he lay close by them with his Army, their Pretor which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to have kept themselves undiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confided by those which were put to Torture: the hatred of the people broke out violently against the Romans: in such wife, that howsoever they durst not take Arms against them, yet such of them as they found dragging from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was detested within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Whereupon Titus requires of the Ætolians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred Soldiers, which he had lost by them, to have paid unto him five hundred talents. Instead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses, which he would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadors to the Acheans, and Albanians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amiss, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserved. Herewith he fails to wailing their Country; and bewails two such Towns of theirs, as did seem to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Acheans and Albanians (especially of the Acheans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this War; yet bestowed him rather to grant peace unto the Ætolians) prevailed to fair with him, that he was pacified with 30 talents, and the punishments of such as were known offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them rejoicing that they were free from the Macedonian and others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrison. Little did they, or the rest of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian War served as an introduction to the War to be made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progress of bad rumors, when the Illyrian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintinus Flaminius the General, having vanquished King Philip and the Macedonian, did will to be at liberty, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrisians, Eubœans, Acheans, of Phthiotis, Magnisians, Thebaisians, and Perthe- bians. The suddenness of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout, yet presently they cried out to hear it again, as if they durst scarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Crafts-masters in the Art of giving thanks: which they rendered now to T. Quintinus with so great affection, as that they had well-near smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available to the Romans in their War against Antiochus, then could have been the possession of a few Towns, yea, or of all those Provinces, which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Illyrian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Counsel, gave audience to Hageflanax and Lysias, King Antiochus his Embassadors: whom they wished to signify unto their Lord, That he should do well to abstain from the Cities in Asia, and not vex them with War: as also to restore whatsoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolemy of Philipp. Moreover they wished him by these his Embassadors, that he should not pass over his Army into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talk with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises unto the Greeks; to the rest they gave what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrisians they gave unto the Ætolians whom they thought it no wisdom to offend overmuch, being shortly to take a greater work in hand. The Acheans of Phthiotis, the same which had been abandoned by T. Quintinus to the Ætolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalia and Lencæa. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howsoever somewhat the Council might favour them, yet was it not meet that they should have their wills, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Trifolys, and Heræa. So the Corinthians were made freeindeed, though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocinthos for that all which were partakers of the Achean Commonwealth, enjoyed their liberty in as absolute manner as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were bestowed those Cattles, which he had gotten from Philip during this War; to reign in them, and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Albanians. The Rhodiens had been their own Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Council, would have given the Towns of Oreus and Eretria, in the Isle of Eubœa, to his son and successor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enjoy their liberty. Orestes, a little Province of the Kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, yet yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also left at liberty, and made it a free estate by it self.

These businessess being dispatched, it remained, that all care should be used, not how to avoid the War with King Antiochus, but how accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore fore Embassadors were sent, both to Antiochus of War against this King; the Romans now had himself, to pick matter of quarrel; and about or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad, & of the Romans therein. What ground and matter refer unto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Wars of the Romans with Antiochus the Great, and his Adherents.

SECT. I.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemy reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race; King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slain by Ptolemy Ceranæus, at an Altar called Argos, having (as is said) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I never read that any mans life hath been preserved, or any mischief avoided by the predictions of such Divellish Oracles. Rather I believe, that many such predictions of the Heathen gods, have been antedated by their Priests, or by others, which deviled them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the son and heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his father, who furnished unto him his own wife Stratonice, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her: Wherefore Ptolemy Ceranæus had great cause to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevengeed by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with fair words, containing himself within Asia; and he had purchased in Europe, with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonice in his fathers life, yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, that cause of his not prosecuting that revenge, whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had Wars with Antigonus Gonatus, and with Nicomachus King of Bithynia. Also Lutatius and Leontinus Kings or Captains of the Gauls, were set upon him by the Luce Nicomachus. With these he fought a great battle: wherein, though otherwise the enemies had all advantages against him, yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horses and them, he won the victory. He took in hand an enterprise against Ptolemy Philadelphus, but finding little success in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berfusa the Chaldean dedicated his History of Assyria; the same which hath since been excellently revised by the Friar Annus. He left behind him one son, called Antiochus Tiberius; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth year of the Kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteen years.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vain and impious title given to him by flattery of the Medians, whom he delivered from Tymarchus, Tyant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitless War with Ptolemy Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolemy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of Das, i. e. the South shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolemy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own Sister Strifone) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that race: It was he that built, and furnished with Books the famous Library of Alexandria: which to adorn and to honour the more, he sent unto Elexarus, then high Priest of the Jews for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews had formerly been very great; for he had set at liberty many of them, as his father held in slavery throughout all Egypt; and he had sent unto the Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Elexarus, yielding unto the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew copy: which Ptolemy caused to be translated into Greek, by twenty two of the most grave and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy, Jesus the son of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to have been one; who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Jugustus, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the high Priest, was written (as T. Josephus affirms) by (3) Josephus that was employed therein. Forty years after, i. e. Ptolemy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and much highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers, who dwelt Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than under the Assyrians many learned men, and among the rest Lodovicus Vivis, hold suspicion that it is counterfeit, and the invention of some late Author, who thought that it were to be suspected in the time of Strabo; it may be somewhat more fully suspected: since a new Edition of it is come forth, purged from faults (as the Papists term those Books, wherein they have changed what they please) and set forth by Milanderpius at Colen. An. Dom. 1578.

he had been in his former years : in which time he boasted that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason : otherwise the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his own crour. He was the first of the Kings derived from Alexander's Successors, that entered into League with the Romans : as also his offspring was the last among those Royal Families, which by them was rooted up.

Antiochus Theos had another wife called Laudice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemy. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with no better regard, than if he had been the Concubine. Laudice hated him for this : yet adventured not to seek revenge, until her own son Selenus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three years after the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus : at what time the poisoned her husband Theos : and, by permission of Selenus her son, murdered Berenice, together with a son that she had born to Antiochus. Justine reports, that Berenice saved her self, together with the young Prince her child, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne : and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her Brother Ptolemy Evergetes King of Aegypt, came to rescue her with an Army : though too late, for the was slain before.

With such cruelties Selenus Callinicus, succeeding unto his Father, that had fifteen years been King, began his reign. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature ; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have been much endangered, if Ptolemy Evergetes, who came against him, had not been drawn back unto his own Country, by some connomations therein hand. For there were none that would bear arms against Ptolemy, in defence of their own King : but rather they sided with the Aegyptian : who took Laudice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Selenus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestic troubles which recalled Evergetes home into Egypt : went about a dangerous piece of work, even to make War upon his own subjects, because of their bad affection towards him : when it had been much better, by well deserving, to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared : in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himself any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarked himself, and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as devoured all save himself, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned nevertheless to his great good ; as soon after it seemed. For when his subjects understood in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences : they had commiseration of his Estate ; and, presuming that he would henceforth become a new man, offered unto him their service with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him such a spirit ; as thinking himself well enough able to deal with the Aegyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had been at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemy in a great battle ; whence he escaped hardly ; so better attended, than after his late Shipwreck. Having therefore back to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would soon be at his heels ; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed ; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen years old, but extremely ambitious ; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himself great. He levied a mighty Army of the Gauls ; wherever he set forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himself. Hereof Ptolemy being advertised : and having no choice to put himself in danger more than he needed, set out True with Selenus for ten years. No sooner was Selenus freed from this care of the Aegyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himself to have the better Army. So Selenus was vanquished again ; and saved himself with so few a pour him, that he was verily supposed to have perished in the battle. Thus did Gods Justice take revenge of those murderers by which the Crown was purchased, and sealed (as might have been thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to hear of his brothers death, as if thereby he had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder then he, for when he led them against Antiochus King of Pergamas, being in hope to honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reign : these perfidious Barbarians took counsel against him, and devised how to strip him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royal house to make head against him ; it would be in their power, to do what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus ; and enforced him to ransom himself with money, as if he had been their lawful Prisoner. Neither were they so contented ; but made him enter into such composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the mean while Selenus had gathered a new Army ; and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the reason fit for himself, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten ; which is no great marvel, since he had reason to stand in no less fear of the Gauls, his own Soldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia ; whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battle, fought between the brethren, Selenus had the upper hand : and Antiochus Hierax (or Hauk) which surname was given him, because he fought his prey upon every one, without care (whether he were provoked or not) feared away as far as he could, both from his brother, and from his own Gauls. Having fetched a great compass through the Mysian and Armenia, he fell at length in Cappadocia ; where his father-in-law King Artamenes took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew ; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived : and therefore betook him to his wings again, though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himself upon Ptolemy ; his own conscience telling him, what evil he meant unto Selenus his brother ; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can find find no sure harbour. Ptolemy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison : whence flying by means of an Harlot, he got out ; yet flying from his Keepers, he fell into the hands of Thieves, by whom he was murdered. Near about the same time died Selenus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his Wars with his Brother. He therefore made a Journey against Aspases founder of the Parthian Kingdom : wherein his evil fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Aspases dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royal entertainment : but in returning home, he brake his Neck by a fall from his Horse, and so ended his unhappy reign of twenty years. He had to wife Laudice the sister of Andromachus, one of his most rusty Captains : which was Father unto that Asbeus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he styled himself) a King ; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laudice he had two Sons ; Selenus the third, surname Ceraunus, and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Selenus Ceraunus reigned only 3 years : in which time he made War upon Antalus the first, that was King of Pergamas. Being weak of body through sickness, and in want of men, he could not keep his men of War in good order : and finally he was slain by Treason of Nicanor and Apantius a Gaul. His death was revenged by Asbeus, who slew the Traitors : and took charge of the Army : which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully while Antiochus the Brother of Selenus being a Child.

SECT. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his Reign. Of Ptolemy Evergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo : an expedition of Antiochus against him. The re-continuance of Antiochus his Egyptian War : with the passages between the two Kings : the Victory of Ptolemy, and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his Rebellion ; his greatest, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings Reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fifteen years old, when he began his Reign, which lasted six and thirty years. In his minority he was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all virtue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful Servants. This vile quality in a Counsellor of such great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord ; and finally unto himself ; the success of things will shortly discover. Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his Reign, Ptolemy Evergetes King of Egypt died, and left his heir Ptolemy Philopater, a young Boy likewise, as hath elsewhere been remembered. This was that Evergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Acheans :

who afterwards took part with Cleomenes : and lovingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatus. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene, by taking to wife Bernice, the Daughter of King Magus. He was the third of the Ptolemies : and the last good King of that good race. The name of Evergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Egyptians ; not so much for the great spoils which he brought home, after his Victories in Syria ; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Onias their high Priest, out of mere covetousness of money, refused to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20 Talents : but he was pacified by the wisdom of Jehusapha a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in Farm the Tributes and Customs that belonged unto him in those parts of Syria which he held. For Callosyria, with Palestina, and all those parts of the Country that lay nearest unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians ; either as having fallen to the share of Ptolemy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slain in the battle at Issus ; or as being won by this Evergetes, in the troublesome and unhappy reign of Selenus Callinicus. The Victories of this Evergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding Ages between the Ptolemies and the Seleucides were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecy before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. Thus Ptolemy Evergetes reigned six and twenty years, and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seem by that which we find in the Prologue unto Jesus the Son of Sirach his book, that he should have reigned a much longer time. For Sirach there saith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Evergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his Father : or that those eight and thirty years, were the years of Jesus his own age ; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did) otherwise reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Evergetes, Hermias the Counsellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War against the Egyptians, for the recovery of Callosyria, and the Countries adjoining. This Council was very unadvisedly given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out in Rebellion, and fought to make himself absolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheless Hermias, being more forward than wife, maintained stilly, that it was most expedient and agreeable with the Kings honour, to fend forth against a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithful : whilst he in person made War upon one that was like himself, a King. No man durst gain-say the resolution of Hermias, who therefore sent Xenatas an Achean, with such Forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebel ; whilst in the mean season an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Callosyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laudicea, and to over the Deserts into the Valley of Musfar, between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodatus an Arabian, that served under Ptolemy. So he continued the time there a while to none effect : and then came news, that Xenatas, his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Army :

and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Country, as far as unto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his Journey, and drew near to the River of Tygris, received many advertisements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills drawn by their Commander to bear Arms against their King. This report was not altogether false, but Molo himself stood in some doubt left his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenatas therefore making haste, as if he had prepared to pass the River by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Camp; and with all the flower of his Army went over Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his Horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not be so stopped, He himself dislodged, and took his Journey towards Medas: leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as distrustful of the faith of his own Soldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy: the great folly of Xenatas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenatas, having born himself proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge, did now presume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the Sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Camp: or rather he commanded them so to do, by making Proclamation. That they should divert up themselves against the Journey, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himself, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily return the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heavy with the Wine, and other good cheer that they had spent at Supper. So Xenatas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the rest were slaughtered without making resistance; and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the heat of this Victory, the Rebel marched unto Seleucia, which he presently took: and, murthering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Country down to the red Sea, or Bay of Persea, he halted unto Susa; where at his first coming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle, that was exceeding strong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this business.

The report of these things coming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Massius, filled him with great sorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took Counsel what to do in this needful case: and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of War he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of Callosyria; and bend his Forces thither, where more need required them. This Counsel was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias: who could not endure to hear good Counsel given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the Journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any odds which he had of the Rebel in strength. Molo distrustful his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good success, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience, if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it fittest for him to assail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by those that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to return back to his Camp: which by force error, took alarm at his return: and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in fight. The King was thus forward in giving battle to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few Men or Ensigns: but all the left wing of the Enemy, which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had sight of the Kings persons: and were ready to do him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the Victory: but Molo shortened the work, by killing himself; as he did also divers of his Friends, who for fear of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their own Swords.

After this Victory, came joyful news, that the Queen Laudice, Daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a Son. Fortune seemed bountiful unto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what use he could of his friendly disposition while it lasted. But now in the Eastern part of his Kingdom, He judged it convenient to visit his Frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counsellor Hermias gave assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himself. For if it should come to pass, that the King was taken out of the World by any casualty: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthning his own Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabanus, who reigned among the Armenians: having the greatest part of his Kingdom situate between the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and feeble; and therefore yielded unto whatsoever conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this Journey Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias: informing him truly how odious he was to the People; and how dangerous he would be shortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus believed this, as having long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring for fear of him to utter his suspicions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made way on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight, a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King never thought of so much art in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoever he seemed gracious whilst he was alive: yet they that for fear had been most obsequious to him, whilst he was in safe to do them hurt, was ready as the fire-moth, to speak of him as he had deserved, when once they were secure of him: yea, his Wife and Children, lying then at Appamea, were slayed to death by the Wives and Children

dren of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achens (of whom we spoke before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in one of these expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to set a Diadem upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpose was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and study to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achens, nor yet disturbed the purposes: but wrote out of these his traitorous purposes, for he had taken him, signifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By these means he emboldened the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by subuision. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recover Callosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemy Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong City near to the mouth of the River Orontes, which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemy Euergetes having lately won it, might, if it had pleased him, have changed the name unto Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endless memorial unto their names, by works proceeding rather from their greatness, than from their virtue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the fame greatness hath continued. Theodorus the Asiaticus, he that before had opposed himself to Antiochus, and defended Callosyria in the behalf of Ptolemy; was now grown sorry, that he had used so much faith and diligence, in service of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his own profit: which thinking to find greater, by applying himself unto him that was (questionless) the more worthy of these two Kings; he offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrs and Ptolemais. Whilst he was devising about this Treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus, his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais, by one of Ptolemy Captains, that was more faithful than himself. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captain who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not only of Tyrs and Ptolemais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Havens: but of so many other Towns in that Country, as emboldened him to think upon making a Journey into Egypt itself. Agababotes and Sesibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemy himself being too loath to have his pleasures interrupted, with business of so small importance, as the safety of his Kingdom. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make provision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be for the War: and nevertheless at the same time, to press Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heat of this business, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians: according to the usual courtesie of the Greeks, desiring to take up the quarrel.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agababotes and Sesibius: who intreated to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this Treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the War: wherein these two Counsellors persuaded themselves reasonably, that the Victory would be their own; if they could get, for money, a sufficient number of Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how delirious the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gave the reader belief, not only for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemy, but because the Rhodesians, and other Embassadors, coming from Memphis, discoursed unto him all after one manner; as being all deceived by the cunning of Agababotes and his fellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himself at the long siege of a Town called Dorus, which he could not win: and being desirous to refresh himself and his Army in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a Truce for four months, with promise that he would be ready to hearken to equal Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would fain have seemed, but only to lull his Enemies asleep, whilst he took time to refresh himself; and to bring Achens to some good order, whose Treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptian would have used, he used himself, as presuming, that when time of the year better served, little force would be needful; for that the Towns would voluntarily yield unto him, since Ptolemy provided not for their defence. Nevertheless, he gave Audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himself well, to dispute about the justice of his quarrel, which he supposed shortly to make good by the Sword, whether it were just or no. He said, that it was agreed between Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be given in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterward ratified, by general consent of the Confederates, after the battle at Issus. But Ptolemy men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said that Ptolemy the Son of Lagi, had won Callosyria, and the Provinces adjoining for himself: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him Forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for Peace; they were in the end of their disposition, as far from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolemy demanded restitution, Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Also Ptolemy would needs have Achens comprehended in the League between them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deal with another, as to take his Rebel into protection, and seek to join him in Confederacy with his own Sovereign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolemy, with a very puissant Army, was coming up against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by these Captains of Ptolomy, that had resisted him the year before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence nevertheless he drove them: and proceeding onwards in his journey, won for many places, that he greatly encreased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captains of Ptolomy forsook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Ægyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battle was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Ægyptian, or the Assatians were the better Soldiers, (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls;) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolomy, with Asinoe his Sister and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the brave deeds of his Ancestors, as not having of their own, whereby to value themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his being of Asia, had they been fewer, would have beaten them. He gave the advantage of those beasts, He drove the Enemies before him, in that part of the battle wherein he fought himself. But Ptolomy had the better men by whose valour he brake the Grofs of his enemies battle, and won the victory: whilst Antiochus was heedlessly following upon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above seventy thousand foot, and six thousand horse: whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not four hundred horse; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in fear, lest Ptolomy and Achæus, setting upon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Ægyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted, it being much against the nature of Ptolomy to vex himself thus with the tedious business of War. So Ptolomy having staid three months in Syria, returned home into Ægypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his Subjects, and all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothful condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the league between these two Kings: or if he had been included therein: yet would not the Ægyptian have taken the pains, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himself strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: for besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this side of Taurus; he had also good success against Attalus King of Pergamus: that was an able man of War, and commanded a strong Army. Neither was he, as Melo the Rebel had been, of one mean regard otherwife, and carried beyond himself by apprehending the advantage of some opportunity: but Confinement to the King, as hath been shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laudice, as was her Sister the Queen, Antiochus his wife. These things had added Majesty unto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, even as one to whom a Kingdom was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, that Ptolomy of Ægypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battle at Raphia: and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrel between sons-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Ægyptian, he was not only slothful, but hindered by a rebellion of his own subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Ægypt, of whom Ptolomy, contrary to the manner of his progenitors, had armed a great number to serve in the late expedition; began to entertain a good opinion of their own valour, thinking it not inferior to such as much as formerly they had done, since they felt themselves, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greeks: which had hitherto kept them in straight subjection. Thus brake out a War between the King and his Subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolomy thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might have been spent, as he thought, much better in revelling: or, as others thought, in favouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Ægyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of War against Achæus. To this purpose he entered into League with Attalus: that so he might distract the forces of his Rebel, and find him work on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had sent up Achæus into the City of Sardis: where he held him about two years besieged. The City was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first years siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Castle it self was upon a very high rock, and in a manner impregnable: as also the Town-wall adjoining to the Castle, in that part which was called the Saræ, was in like manner situate upon steep Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung over a deep bottom, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, used to be thrown. Now it was observed by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there never wanting, used to fly up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Observing this often, he reasoned with himself, and concluded that those parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his judgement, and gave unto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprise. The success was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceived, and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and whilst a general assault was made, entered the Town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the same place had the Persians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardis: when Cresus thought himself secure, on that side. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a loss of many ages past: and therefore out of memory. Achæus held still the Castles: which not only seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries, and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well affured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to wait much time about it: having none other hope to prevail, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the usual tediousness of expectation, his business called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and Partians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they still incroached. But he thought it not safe, to let Achæus break loose again. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolomy the Ægyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole study, how to deliver this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appear in the Country under Taurus, he would soon have an Army at command, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretian, that was acquainted well with all the ways in the Country, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rocks, whereon the Castle of Sardis stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receive at the hands of Ptolomy, as well as of Achæus, to do his best for performance of their desire. He undertook the business: and gave such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus, by one Arimæus, a truly messenger, whom Bolis found means to convey into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They all wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Cyphers, wherewith none save he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger, he was a truly fellow, and one whom Achæus found by examination, heartily affected unto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were that he should be confident in the faith of Bolis: and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had won unto the business, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus: under whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Castle of Sardis. Nevertheless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himself to some adventure. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himself should come speak with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, save only by Bolis and Cambylus: which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrymen, * Among these few I do not except one, calling him- self Edemus. John Andrew a Cretan, who in one of his late famous less Libels, wherein he traduced our King, Religion, and Country, are,) false knaves. These two held a consultation together, that was, as (*) Polybius observes it, rightly Critical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deliverance they undertook, nor touching the discharge of their own faith: but only how to get most with least ado and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That both of all, they would equally share between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveal the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatness of such a service, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no less glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readiness on both sides, and that Bolis with Arimæus was to get up into the Castle, and convey Achæus thence: He first went with Cambylus to speak with the King, who gave him very private audiences; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberal promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithful unto Ptolomy, whom he had long served, he accompanied Arimæus up into the Castle. At his coming thither, he was lovingly entertained: yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the business in hand. But he discoursed so well, and with such gravity, that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or judgement. He was an old Soldier, had long been a Captain under Ptolomy, and did not thrust himself into this business; but was invited by honourable and faithful men. He had also taken fair country, in winning (as it seemed) that other Country-man of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already foundry times given fair passage and repassage unto Arimæus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said, that he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or four of his friends; from whom, when he received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himself. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider what he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, that he had to do with one, whose treachery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their plots this, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arimæus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft: and Bolis following behind, should have an eye upon Achæus, to prevent him, not only from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwise killing himself: to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arimæus going before as Guide: the rest following as the way served, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Laudice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his special friends to bear him company. They were all disguised: and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongue;

K k k k k speaking

speaking and answering as need should require for all, as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily devising upon his business, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) though he were of Crete, and prone to furnish any thing to the mischief of another, yet could he not see in the dark, nor know which of them was Achens, or whether Achens himself were there. The way was very unsafe, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to stay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achens; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gave Bolis to understand that he was the man: and so by their unseasonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambyses lay in wait, Bolis whistled, and presently clapped Achens about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stir. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus, who late up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The light of Achens, brought in bound unto him, did so astonish the King, that he was unable to speak a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betwixt, assembling his friends together, he condemned Achens to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him these tears, as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverb, Un traidor dos deslejos. The death of Achens brought such astonishment upon those which held the Cattle, that after a while they gave up the place and themselves unto the King; where by he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some years passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater, to one Philip, a man of small regard: thorthly they fell to Eumenes, then to Antigonus: and from him, together with the Meds, to Seleucus; under whose prosperity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Calinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustful infoleny of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Calinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gauls, did stir up Asaces, a nobleman of the Country, to seek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebel. So he slew the Kings Lieutenant; made himself King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania. Though prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings, and took Seleucus Calinicus prisoner in battle, whom he royalty entertained and dismissed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawful King: and by good government of his Country, procured unto himself such love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his successors; like as that of the Pro- lumes in Egypt, and that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging unto the Soleneads beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with a strong army, that they durst not meet him in plain field; but kept themselves in woods or places of strength, and defended the Straights and passages of mountains. The resistances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him to great a multitude, and so well fortified, as he needed not to turn out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Straights between their mountains; it being easy to spare of so great a number, as many as fetching a compass about, might either get above the enemies heads, or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often employ against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to disfigure, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durst not adventure themselves in open ground. Asaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own subjects, yet feared to encounter so mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad ways and Defarts would have caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: He caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemy must pass, to be dammed up and spoiled. By which means, and the resistance before his face, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himself out of the way; suffering his Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Country: wherein without some Victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, that Asaces was nothing thorough provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania, where he won Zombrace, the chief City of that Province. This indignity, the chief City of that Province, caused Asaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that seemed strong enough, to adventure a battle. The issue thereof was such as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Asaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiss, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but having gotten the Kingdom from those that had rebelled, kept it himself. With Euthydemus he fought a battle by the River Araxes, where he had the Victory. But the Victory was not so greatly to his honour, as was the testimony which he gave of his own private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Army. His horse was slain under him; and he himself received a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himself back unto the furthermost parts of his Kingdom, and afterwards protracted the War, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, that a Country of his was unjustly usurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had won it from the children of the Urr-

pers: and further, that the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, save by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Seythians, with whom if they should join; it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his own weariness, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the son of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Ambassador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to give him in marriage, one of his own daughters; and therewithal permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdom, causing him nevertheless to deliver up his Elephants; as also to bind himself by oath, to such Covenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus, leaving the Bactrian In quiet, made a journey over Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophaganes, King of the Indians, the society that had been between their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his War against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Country. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was overburied in a great Civil War: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stir up his country-men to rebellion; making himself their Captain, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he soon changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Majesty of a King. Finally he got unto himself (having an Army of six hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had been Alexanders: In this estate he had well confirmed himself, ere Seleucus Nicanor could find leisure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himself at the coming of Seleucus; but met him in the field, as ready to defend his own, so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdoms, was continued by some offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon; by the Indian King, to an hundred and fifty: as also he was promised, to have some treasure sent after him, which he left one to receive. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generations, any business worthy of remembrance with the Western countries. The posterity of Sandrocottus is thought to have retained that Kingdom unto the days of Augustus Cæsar: to whom Purus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with presents, and an Epistle written in Greek, wherein among other things, he said, That he had command over six hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundry Authors, the mention of some which held that Kingdom, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophaganes carried himself as the worthier person, receiving presents, and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Asia, but on the higher side of Taurus, humbled themselves unto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his own greatness within few years ensuing, by preferring to stand upon points with the Romans: whose great Crafts was the same indeed, that his was only in seeming.

SECT. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolomy Philopater in Egypt: with the Tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomy Epiphanes, the son of Philopater. His irresolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly srew to him; intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doing, against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him.

This expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himself a while; and study which way to convert the error of his pusillance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolomy Philopater died: leaving his son Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the Kingdom: unlikely by him to be well defended against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolomy furnished Philopater, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that surname given him in meerdiction; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly past, his childhood when he began to reign, may seem to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the heedfulness of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any mischief, whereof he could be accused. Having won the battles at Raphiah, He gave himself over to sensuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agabecles. At her instigation, He murdered his own wife and sister; which had adventured her self with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-ships of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred unto the disposition of this Agabecles, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy bawd that was mother unto them both. So strict these governed the Realm at their pleasure, to the great grief of all the Country, till Philopater died; who having reigned seventeen years, left none other son than Ptolomy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Asione that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governor of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolomy the first, and would not be accounted Egyptians, as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth unto them his sister Agabecles, with the young King in her arms, began a solemn Oration. He told them, That the deceased Father of this their King, had committed the Child into the arms of his Sister: but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole fate of the Kingdom did now rely. He behought them therefore that they would be faithful, and, as great need was, defend their King against the Treason of one Tirolepmus an ambitious man; who traitorously went about to force the King to the death of his Mother, and to fling her stranger to the Royal blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should justify his accusation against Tirolepmus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained pallion of sorrow, and countesteining tears: the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shameless dissembler he was, to take so much upon him, as if he knew not so lately how he had abused their faith.

Affirmably that had called it, being feared aware how. Agaboles therefore, whom the old King fathers had made mighty, but neither wife nor well qualified, thought to go to work, as had formerly been his manner; by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He halted out of the Temple the Mother-in-law of Tirolepmus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though she never committed the old Kings sin) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their minds, wherein they had conceived extrem hate against their three pernicious Mis-governors of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injury done to Tirolepmus, they were somewhat also moved with fear of harm; which in way of requital, Tirolepmus was likely to do unto the City. For he was thought a man moit cruel. For Government, as he had never proved, yet he had committed the full belovment of the people. It was also then in his power, to flap the provocation of Victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agaboles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproar. He fiercely apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracy against him; and delivered him unto a follower of his, to be executed by torture. This poor Souther was taken to the innermost room of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparel to be tormented. But whilst the whips were brought forth, and all things even in a readiness for that purpose, there was brought unto the Minister of Agaboles, a fed report of Tirolepmus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room; leaving Moragates the Souilder alone by himself, and the doors open. He perceiving this, the poor Souilder, who had never before come out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians who were he found some in a Temple thereby at Dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Privileges, as are the Turks Janizaries. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus been used, they fell to Arms in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, that they would fee the King, and not leave him in possession of so dangerous a man. The whole multitude of the City, who were gathered, made no less ado than the Souilders, though without effect. So the old Bawd Ononathis fled into a Temple: her Son and Daughter stayed in the Court, until the King was taken from them, and they, by his permission, which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the fury of the people. Agatboles himself was stabbed to death, by some, which therein did the Office of Friends; though in manner of Enemies. His Sister was dragged naked up and down the Streets; as was also his Mother, with all to them belonging; the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of Justice: biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces,

The troubles in Egypt, I feared well to stir up King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make War upon young Pholomy. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what he could of the Chilids Estate. But it happened well, that Pholomy Philip in the Punic War, which was now newly ended, had done many offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Egyptians were bound themselves, and craved help against these two Kings: who, though they secretly malign'd one the other; yet had entred into covenant to divide between them all that belonged unto this Orphan: whose Father had been confederate with them both. So t^m M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonians he was very soon found, busied with War at his own Doors. Antiochus the Seleucid, being a follower to the Egyptian, was first sent into Greece to raise an Army of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I do not find: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was sent thither only one of the three Embassadors, in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been shewed before. As for Scopas he shortly after went up into Syria with his Army, to win winning many places, among the reit of which he subdued that of Antioch. He had to have yielded themselves a little before unto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his War, and despair'd of receiving help from Egypt. So Vide Ju- it was not long e're all their Victories of Scopas 19th. Ant.
came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Eusebius) the Jud. lib. 13.
same year that Philip was beaten at Cynephsean cap. 5.
Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battle, and recovered all that he had lost. Among the reit, the Jews, with great willingness, returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entertained.

The Land of Egypt, this great King did forbear to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to bestow a Daughter of his own in Marriage unto Ptolemy: either hoping, as may seem, that this Country would willingly submit it self unto him, or else that this young Child should happen to miscarry; or else that he might have some made in the Western parts of Asia, whilst Ptolemy was so busied labouring by the Romans. It appears that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Attalus, Philip, and the Greeks, promising to afford him great advantage, if he should bring to pass what he intended; the great desire to see the fate of Egypt, being such as hath been declared, flamed easily to be swallowed up at once. One while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jews, among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yield him obedience. Another while, leaving Egypt alone, he was about to make invasion upon Attalus his Neighbour.

dom; yet suffered himself easily to be perfwaded by the Roman Embassadors, and deſcited from that enterprife. Having thus far gratified the Romans, he ſends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect Amity between him and them. It is not lightly to be over-paſſed, That theſe his Embaſadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dil-miſſed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not ſincere; being rather framed and ſet out to regard the Kings good liking than the ſubſtance of the Intent. They had not yett made an end with Philip; neither would they gladly be troubled with two great Wars at once. Wherefore, not flanding much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the preſent. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and thoroly prepares to win ſome Towns eſcaped, belonging unto Ptolomy, yett withall he ſends an Army Weſward, intending to make what profit he can of the ſubſtitution of Antiochus to his ſon, who is ſufferable as an argument of his much irrefolution, how, notwithstanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdoms, he offered one of his Daughters to Ptolomy, and another to Eumenes the Son of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: ſeeking each of their friendſhips at once and the ſame time, when he fought to make each of them a ſpoil. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable deſire of Repugnancies, which is a Difcale of great and over-ſwelling-fortunes. Howsoever it was, he ſent an Army of Saracens by Land, and two of his ſhips by Sea, to ſeize the ſtroy for him, to whiſt he himſelf, with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other Veſſels, intended to paſs along by the Coaſts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in ſuch places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable act of the Rhodians, that, whiſt the War of Philip lay yett upon their hands, they adventured upon this Great Antiochus. They ſent unto him a proud Embaſſage; whereby they gave him to underſtand, That if he paſſed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cilicia, they would meet with him, and fight with him; nor for any quarrel of theirs, or of the Romans, but ſolely for the ſake of Philip their Enemy, and to ſave him againſt the Romans. It was infinitely done of them, neither ſeemed it otherwiſe, to preſcribe ſuch limits unto the King: yett he tempered himſelf, and without any ſhew of indignation, gave a gentle answer; partly himſelf to their Embaſſadors; partly unto their whole City, by Embaſſadors which he thither ſent. He ſhewed his deſire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Anceſtors and them: and willed them not to be affraid, left his coming ſhould tend unto any hurt either to them, or to the Romans Moderates. At the ſetting forth the Romans whom they ſent, he ſaid: It would moleſt: they were (he ſaid) his very good Friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and welcome to them newly given to his Embaſſadors.

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning People, and such as could fore-fee what Weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit, when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian War was ended at the Battle of Cynocephale. They knew that Antioch's his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still, unless the Towns on the South Coast of Affia, belonging to Polemey their Friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had been very beholding to all the Race of the Pharaohs. They were in this time of necessity, gave what aid they could to the Jews, and the Egyptians in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the Son of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the War that followed between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his Daughters upon him in Marriage: He excused himself, saying, he would not have her. Attalus and Philetas, his Brethren, were also of this mind; but he told them, that the Romans would surely make War upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he said, that by abstaining from this affinity, it should be in his power to join with the Romans, and strengthen himself greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus, as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so he should be sure to be oppressed by him, as by an over-mighty Neighbour, if he happened to win the Victory.

Antiochus himself wintred about Ephesus where he took such order as he thought convenient for reducing of Synna and Lampascus to obedience; that had usurped their Liberty, and obstinately strove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed unto the Hellespont where, having won some Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed over into Asia, and in the most space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence, went he forth into the Thracian had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman War. The Asiatics objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference between T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachus, by thrusting therein a Garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, That his Garrison did not oppress the Town, but save it from the Barbarians: who took and sacked it, as soon as the Macedonians were gone. His answer was good and substantial, though it did not satisfy the Asiatics, might appear by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachus at his coming thither. For the Town was utterly rased by the Barbarians, and the people carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as also to redeem those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he took care to allure thither, by hopeful promises, many Inhabitants, and to repopulate it with wanted people. Now, to the end that Antiochus should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a Journey in hand against those barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half to repair the City. These pains he took, partly in regard of the convenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachus; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and establish the Dominion of those parts which he had lost. Antiochus the Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdom of greater extent than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearly pay: and as after that Victory against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdom, founded by Seleucus, ensue very speedily after the re-conquest of the same Country, which was the last of Seleucus his Purchases.

SECT. IV.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their War with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his Enemies, and by the Romans. His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The War of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

FOR the Romans, though they were unable to smother their desire of War with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their Friends and by their Enemies: yet was it much against their will to keep the rumour on Foot, which they meant shortly to make good. Of this intended War, so long as they wanted matter of guards; whereof they were furnished, by this catastrophe of the Kings about Lysimachus was not long, since King Antalus, a Friend and helper of the Romans in his War with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speak for him, because the one of these Kings was held no less a Friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards pass between them any other offices, than very Friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invasion from the Kingdom of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilst as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptance: as they did in outward show. But when the Macedonian War was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into terms of war, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsellors sent from Rome, requested (as hath been shewed before) with a commination of War, this Kings gratulation of their Victory: as also his long professed amity, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto Peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progress through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree. That two of them should visit King Antiochus, and the rest, where occasion served, diligence to make a party strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindful of the business; wherein, left T. Quintius, with his ten Alliasts, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging. L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deal with the King about those controversies, that were between him and Psolomy. What other private instructions Cornelius had, we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassy. For coming to Selybria: and there understanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having been sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia. He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsellors from Bargilia, to be present at the Conference. Heghanax and Lysia were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those preumptory Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound unto their Master. After a few days Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the business in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver back unto Psolomy those Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly. That he must also give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that War, wherein they had laboured so much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Army into Europe: for that other cause of his Journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make War upon the Romans: To this the King made answer, That he wondered, why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith he prayed them to let him alone: even as he, without such curiosity, suffered them to do in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe: they saw well enough what business had drawn him thither; namely, the War against the barbarous Thracians: the re-building of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that Country, he derived it from Seleucus: who made Conquest thereof, by his Victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversy belonged to him and the other Kings, had been fill of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians: but had been seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindered by multiplicity of business, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia: since it was his purpose to bestow this City upon one of his Sons, that should reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia: either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt: since it was his meaning to make the free Cities belonging unto himself, and to join a tie long with Psolomy, not only in Friendship, but in a Bond of near Affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refuse it, would needs hear further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and Lampisac, whom he had there with him, could could say for themselves. The Embassadors of the Lampisac being called in, began a tale, wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges, Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held some few days, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the War by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well fatished, and thereby to corroborate the present Peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Galle-Greeks, pretend only the goodness of their Swords: nor yet over-modestly, to retain among the Greek an opinion of their justice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was weary of these tedious Gueils: that would take no answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came news, without any certain Author, That Psolomy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus to take possession of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Country in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador both to Antiochus and to Psolomy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian Voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his Son Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he took along with him, and sailed unto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deal with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort as might stand with honesty, and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his Voyage, he was perfectly informed that Psolomy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a Tempel, with a grievous Shipwreck, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Selybria. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: to secure as might appear, of the Roman War.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had been sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsel, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to declare society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same Friends and Enemies, and this he advised him to do quickly, before the War had brake out with Antiochus: lest otherwise he might, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be satisfied with weak excuses. In like manner some of the Greek were solicited; and particularly the Ætolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needless to say plainly whereto this entreaty tended: the forward answer made by the Ætolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had been during the War. They that so complained, were the most moderate of them. Others cried out, that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promised unto them: upbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding: not only for their Victory over Philip, but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs: and then should all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the Enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chafe out of their City this honourable Man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his virtue against them in the Civil Administration: and given them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the way in Carthage: holding their places during life: and having subject unto them, the Lives, Goods, and Fame of all the rest. Neither did they use this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that whofo offended any of them, should have them all to be his Enemies: which being once known, He was sure to be soon accused and condemned. In this their important rule of the City, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By virtue of which Office, though he was superior unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto such an annual Magistrature, as at the years end must be accountable unto them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore tending for one of the Quætors, or Officers of the Treasury, to come and speak with him: the proud Quæstor set lightly thereby, and would not come: For he was of the adverse Faction to Hannibal: and men of his place were to be chosen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the Spirit of future Greatness. But he had not to do with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal felt for him by a Purfivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publick Assembly of the People. There he not only shewed, what the undutiful stubbornness of this Quæstor had been; but how unsufferable the insolvency of all the Judges at the present was: whose unbridled power made them to regard neither Laws nor Magistratures. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable: He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the general good liking; That the Judges should be chosen from year to year, and no one man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been passed, before he passed over Theris: it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hannus, to have brought him unto acceffity of reforming another grievance concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levy by Taxation, laid upon the whole Commonality, as wanting money in their publick Treasury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needful charges. Hannibal confiding in this, began to examine the publick Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into into the Treasury, by ways and means whatsoever: and in what sort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasury, but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the moneys to their own use, were thereby fain to load the people with needful burdens. Hereof he made fuch plain demonstration, That these Robbers of the common Treasury were compelled to restore, with shame, what they had gotten by knavery: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessity of making fuch poor shifts, as formerly they had used, when they knew not the value of their own Estate. But as the virtue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had since the making of the peace until now, little regarded him, began to rage extremely: as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themselves to have been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong again, and Hannibal would shortly be in arms. Questionless, if oppressing the City by injustice, and robbing the Treasury, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: that Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out. That having done their best labour to keep all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than War. But having no other matter to allege, than their own inventions: they said, That Hannibal was like unto a wild beast, which would never be tamed; That secret messages passed between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleness, as if it were harmful to Carthage's with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not unto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, every that was of his own friends at Rome, and such as were Senators: they wrought so well, that neither public notice of their Conspiracy was taken at Carthage: nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Only P. Scipio is said to have admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by fuborning or countenancing false witnesses against him; the man, against whom in war they had not of long time prevailed, nor used their victory in fuch base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great minded as Scipio: they wished for some fuch advantage against Hannibal: and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whose very names imports sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having pass'd the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming: and being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Maffiniffa. But Hannibal had kept good efpial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It was enough to say, That he escaped them by flight; but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particulars. Having openly shewed himself, as

was his manner, in the place of assembly, He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination: though fuch as he might well trust. He had appointed Horles to be in a readiness at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea-side. There had he a ship furnished with all things needful; as having long expected the necessity of some fuch journey. So he bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his own. Passing over to the Isle of Cercina: He found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chief among them began to enquire, whether he was bound. He said, He went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended thence in the Island to make Sacrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their Sails and Yards to be used instead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleep: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was fure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to find any news of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some loss of time, fuch of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina, being buſied a while in fitting their tackle. As Carthage, the misis of so great a person was diversely construed. Some guessed right, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been seen; and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an evil grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of the Senate: mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that he fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrant, by reason of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch: and finding the King departed, visited his Son in Daphne: who fiently welcomed him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoiced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorry: otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove alike ease unto this great Commander to make fuch Soldiers of base Affatiquers; as it had been by his training and discipline, to make very serviceable and skilful men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardly, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being to extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithal considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his flatterers, and a thousand other fuch vexations, would be far more powerful in making unprofitable the virtue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions, wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him less careful to avoid the war; then should it further serve, to justify the Romans in their quarrel. And seems indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making war. Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Arms, unless by meer violence he were thereto enforced. Only the Ætolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innovation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Councillers, That the Senate would grant them whatsoever with reason they should ask. But this promise was too large, and unadvised. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing: but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves, otherwise than by speaking fuch words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame, who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome, was, of War with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to upbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliverers had laid heavier fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear: but yet brighter and fairer than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the Legs of the Greeks their chain, and tie about their Necks. There was indeed no cause of carrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid upon him, all the Towns of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Country, at peace, both with the Romans, and within it self. As for Antiochus, He made it his daily suit, That the Peace between him and Rome, fuch as it was, might be confirmed and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Nevertheless, T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize upon Greece, as soon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, he retained still in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Aceronion: by benefit of which Towns, he might the better withstand the dangerous Invasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius, were the reports of the ten Embassadors, that had been sent over to alight him; when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they said, would questionless fall upon Greece: wherein he should find not only the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do somewhat against these their suspected Enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance: whilst Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intensive to his business. These reports went not on by current through the City among the Vulgar; but found fuch credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprife in hand: P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be General in the War, against the King and his Hannibal. For the present, the business with Nabis was referred unto Titus, to deal with him as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tardiance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also he knew that many of the Greeks would not be sorry: though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entered into friendship with him, two or three years before this, as is already shewed; whilst he had war with Philip: and had further been contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Ætolians: neither since that time had he done any thing, whereby he should draw upon himself this War. He was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Ætolians: as one, that besides his own wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme wherewith to discourse the Embassadors of all the Confederate Cities, which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them that in the War with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themselves had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearsed) that should stir them up, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other Interest, than only the making perfect of their Honour, in setting all Greece at Liberty: which Noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilst the Noble City of Argos was left in subjection to a Tyrant that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken: or whether otherwise to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themselves. The Athenian Embassador made answer hereto thus very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could devise. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was said: extolled their Vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of their propolition: wherein unrequited they freely made offer to continue that Bounty, which at the vehement request of their poor Associates they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pity it was to hear fuch notable Vertue and high Deeds ill spoken of by some: which took upon them, out of their own imagination, to foretell what harm these their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as thankfulness would rather have required an Acknowledgement of the Benefits and Pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætolians: wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their ancient glory, in those times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the Liberty general: from which Honour they were now to be fallen, that they became Parasites unto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base affection, would lead all the rest into servitude. Then spake he against the Acheans, Clients that had been a long time unto the Macedonians; and Souldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adversity. These, he said, had gotten Corinth, and must now have War be made for their fakes, to the end that they might also be Lords of Argo: whereas the Aetolians, that had first made War with Philip, and always been Friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus content himself, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrius, Chalcis, and the Agroecornith; having been always wont to profits, That Greece could never be at Liberty, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seek by this discourse of War with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to find themselves occupied, that so they might have some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should do well, if they meant as they spake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece, which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Aetolians themselves did promise, and would undertake, That they would either cause him to fly to reason, and relinquishing Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compel him by force of Arms, to submit himself to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at unity. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common Liberty wrought so much with these Aetolians; did their own ravenous desire of oppressing others, and getting unto themselves, that worse would use it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well defendible this; making it no small part of their Grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans should enjoy the spoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in possession of the Aetolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Acheans, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right, but the Aetolian thieves be enforced to keep home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Aetolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. He cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsellors which had been sent unto him from Rome, to be his Alliants in these matters of weight, were now returned home, and that without them it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedemonian War, it was very soon ended. For Titus used the help of all his Confederates, and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he should have had to do with Philip. Besides the Roman Forces, King Eumenes with a Navy, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the Service: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land, doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans; or whether to make one among the number, in seeking Revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Acheans, who let out ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. As for the Aetolians, rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their help was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Acheans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece: having removed the Aetolians from that degree of favour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all halves) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wife, began a conspiracy against the Lacedemonians: that held their Town; meaning to open their Gates unto the Romans. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and slain: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, caused the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no fire within the Walls: the execution done upon the first movers, having terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assail Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedemon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom whereof fine the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the War should thereon fall most heavily.

Nabis had in readiness an Army of fifteen thousand, wherewith to defend himself against these Invaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his own Country, but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted slaves, malefactors and base Peasants, unto whom his Tyranny was beneficial. Of the good and worthy Citizens he stood in doubt; and since he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an assembly, and compelling them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and work dangerous treasons: it seemed unto him the safest, and (withal) the mildest course to arrest before hand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not only the City and his own person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourscore of them; whom he leads away to prison, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet break loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else do than terrify the people; who must thereby understand, that it was a mortal crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it self unto some poor wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flee to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a saluety: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at first; but were at length repelled with loss. Titus abode not many days before Sparta: but over-ran the Country, hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battle. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid siege unto Gythium, the only or principal Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Town equal in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or desire of reward, had the purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithful, due the Traitors after whose death, he himself alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Army came thither to Gythium: this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might do for him, but was contented to give up the place, yet upon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the Son-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his Wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government; with a thousand Souldiers, Mercenaries, and two thousand Argives: it being (as may seem) the Tyrants purpose, to relieve Gythium, which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to think upon finishing the War, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassador to Titus: requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parley the Tyrant spake very reasonable for himself: proving, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments: whereof the sum was, That whatsoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of older date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for this keeping the Town of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleged, they ought to make war upon him, since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoever, had not hindered them, in time of their own need of him, from entering into that League with him: which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with tyranny; and gave instance, as easily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him, it was expedient, that some other cause of this Invasion should be alleged. Wherefore he said further, that this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to join with Philip; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, since in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom he had long held War: it may seem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this Tyrant: and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it seems that Antiochus, the Father of the Acheans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans (that were wont to talk so much of their own justice, honour, and faithful dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong: framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his own estate: and to settle his fortunes, whilst he might do it without hazard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and lived in great security, honour, and happiness, as private men. Thus they discouraged until night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos, and requested them, to deliver to him in writing their other commands, that he might take counsel with his friends. The issue of all was, that, in regard of the charges whereof the Confederates must be for maintenance of an Army to lie in League all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short work) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon such Conditions as Titus should think meet. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounding many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. He would not suffer the Lacedemonians to have ought to do in the Isle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Island or elsewhere; not to build any Town or Castle upon his own Lands: not to keep any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome injunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in silver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight years next ensuing. For observance of these Covenants he demanded five hostages, such as he himself should name: and one of them to be the Tyrant's own Son. It had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the War from Nabis, because it was not grounded upon justice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himself did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then should this enterprise, when once it was taken in hand, have been prosecuted unto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themselves by the spoil of one that had not offended them; nor pleasing to the Acheans, who judged it ever after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister unto the Aetolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not be suffered by these Masterly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedæmon, once the most famous City among all the Greeks; was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had usurped it but yesterday; and he therein rooted by their authority, as his friend and Confederate, Nabis on the other side thought himself unmercifully dealt withal, by the self-same Romans, whose amity he had preferred in time of a doubtful war, before the love and affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But fallily had he dealt with the Macedonian; and fallily was he dealt with by those to whom he dealt himself. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, save only that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Agæopolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child was driven out by Lycurgus the first of the Tyrants; there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their City and Estates; but only leave required for as many of their Wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give content unto these demands; and sustained an assault or two, hoping belike that the enemies would soon be weary. But his fearful nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injustices had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages, and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans far more wicked than himself, and was ready upon the first advantage, to do them all the mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard news that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This creded them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison, which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to help the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them jointly should set their hands to the getting of it, which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintus to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laid hold without flaying for him; and that he might the better entitle himself thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemean games; as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Council of Achaia; whereby the Achaïans were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business, or none wherewith to set on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassy to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio and the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The unforcible meaning of Antiochus and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard; yet not sufficient causes of making war. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of thoroughly perswading all the Greeks

(which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Country was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it self, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near distance appearing, he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsels, touching the moderate use of their liberty, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acercombus to the Achaïans withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be known, what years the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retain those places. With joyful acclamations did the Greeks testify their good liking of that which Titus had said and done; as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransom and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Country by Hannibal.

Thus Titus Crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end; and by leaving the Country before his departure, was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his virtue and benefits, untainted by jealousie and suspicion of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph, which was the goodliest of all that Rome had until that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of the pomp continued: as being set out with the spoils of a Country, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made war. All sorts of Arms, with Statues and curious pieces of Brass or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first daies Pageant. The second day, was brought in all the treasure of Gold and Silver: Some in the rude Mass unwrought, some in divers sorts of Coins; and some in Vessels of sundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were ten fields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himself entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, bestowed upon him by divers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice, the Prisoners, and the hostages; among which, Demetrius the Son of King Philip, and Armenes the Son of Nabis, were Principal. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the shew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after this triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very favourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus; whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintus, and the ten that had been his Counsellors; because their business was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Rome Embassadors wondered. They said unto Titus and his Associates, that they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their mes-

For all treaties of peace and friendship, were either between the Victor and the vanquished; or between those, that having warred together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between those, that had lived always in good agreement, without any quarrel. Unto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yield; and patently endure the imposition of some Covenant, that else might seem unreasonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it usual to demand and make restitutions of things and places claimed, gotten or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between those which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be propounded: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their own; and neither carry it self as superior to the other, in preferring ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the league and friendship that had been so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to prescribe unto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should think fit. Hereto Quintus answered, that since they went so distinctly to work, He would also do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to except; Either that it should be lawful for the Romans to take part in Asia with any that should seek their friendship; Or if King Antiochus disliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abstain from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe, then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make War with a King that fought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lysimachia, wherein he had of late been at so much cost; in building it up even from the foundation, and re-peopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been dispersed, or captive to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleged: saying, That Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour the Romans took upon them as if their cause were far the superior. For it was, they said, their purpose to set at liberty those Towns which the King would oppress and hold in subjection; especially since those Towns were of Greekish blood and language; and fell, in that regard under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greece betwixt. By this colour they might soon have left Antiochus King of not many subjects on the hither side of Eubœra. Neither did they forbear to say, That unless he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect those which relied upon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be understood) with such as were his subjects. Wherefore they urged his Embassadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of their two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadors could not hereto make, little wanted of giving present defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be intreated, and were contented once again to send over P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a final answer, whether their demands made by Quintus and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitless Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years; or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

SECT. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Maffianiffa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for justice in vain.

THE Insulrians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians; made often (in a manner) continual war upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, until such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of the Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for wages; and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath been shewed, by this their fellowship in Arms, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldom afterwards either the Gauls or Ligurians did stir alone; but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possession in Gallia Cisalpina; now Ch. 2. p. 8. called Lumbarie: it hath been long since rehearsed in the first and second Punic Wars. As Book also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this war, had not been distracted by the Ligurians: that always made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Country was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had: but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken or besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoil their Land. In these respects, they served exceedingly well to train up the Roman Soldiers to hardness and military patience: teaching them (besides other ex-cerdies of War) to endure much, and live content with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gauls, their neighbours and companions: partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obdurate continuance in the War which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages: To be friends or foes, by custom, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such virtue in Leagues, and to acknowledge no such conclusion of peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage, or taking revenge of injuries when they return to mind. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them and any of their neighbours, do use commonly this answer, It hath till been the custom for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Liguriens gave unto the Romans: but many more and greater they received. Often they fought peace, when they found themselves in distress, and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Country was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Country they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make War, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Ox-side; and the Romans themselves found in it the property of that Ox-side which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Emblem of his large Dominions. For trading upon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldom did it happen that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay farthest, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hard Nation, and easily stirred up to arms; but had not much knowledge in the art of war, nor any good Captains. They wanted also (which was their principal hindrance) good intelligence among themselves: and being divided into many small Signories, that had little other communication than of language, they seldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had united themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And there were the causes of their often overthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking arms.

The Carthaginians had been accustomed, to make evacuation of this Choleric Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their wars abroad, those that were most likely to be unquiet at home. They had also taken Soldiers from one part of the Country, and used them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raised upon the whole Country; as being far better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise, the Romans, using the service of their own Legions, and of their surrounds the Latins, had little business for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much business with them. Spain was too far distant, and withall too great for them to send over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they should always maintain such Armies in the Country, as might serve to hold in obedience perforce; and such heedful Captains as might be still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did, and thereby held the Country; though seldom in peace.

Very soon after the departure of Scipio, there was raised War in Spain against the Romans, even upon the same general ground, as that was the foundation of all the Spanish Wars following. It was thought unreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while help the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; barely forgetting to help themselves against those that were Drangers, yet usurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in those parts, suppressed this rebellion by many Victories: and, together with subjection, brought peace upon the Country, which lasted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War: yet left it still remaining the cause of the War; which after five years brake out again.

The Spaniards fought a battle with the Roman Pro-consul, whom they slew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy success of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to fend thither two Pretors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the year following, and sent unto that Province, found at his coming little else to do, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one mind: some were faithful to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the pains that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chieftest of them, they rose against him in many parts of the Country, and put him unto much new trouble. Whilst he was about to make a journey against those that were as yet unsubdued; some of the lately vanquished, were even ready to rebel. He therefore dismissed them; which they took so heavily, that many of them slew themselves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well understanding that such desperation might work dangerous effects: He called unto him the principal among them: and commanding unto them peace and quietness, which they never had disturbed but unto their own great loss. He prayed them to devise what course might be taken for holding them assured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counsel in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject: He gave express charge. That upon a day appointed they should throw down the Walls of all their Towns. Afterwards he carried the war about from place to place; and with singular industry finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, against other of their Countrymen: excusing the indignity, such as it seemed, seemed, with a jest. That if he were vanquished and slain, then should he need to pay them nothing: whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the War to so good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publick Revenues in that Province, by causing some Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the commonwealth by a virtue much agreeable to his own peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other useful qualities, that very little was wanting in him which might seem requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. He was very skilful in the Roman Laws, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any business either private or publick. Many books he wrote; whereof the principal were, of the Roman Antiquities, and of Husbandry. In matter of Husbandry he was notable, and thereby most increased his subsistence; being of a mean birth, and the first of his house. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him unto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sincerity of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himself to the ancient laudable Customs of the City: wherein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not caused him to malign the virtue of that noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men, that were no less honest than himself, though far less rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwise, he was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himself to all occasions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved business for well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himself, or accusing others. For at the age of four-score and six years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accused Sergius Galba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family, which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Orator: one that being of like virtue and fervency, had all his good purposes done, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such nobility and greatness as his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Country, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many: and the Country seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Pretors therefore, of which two every year were sent over Commanders unto Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely fail of such work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One flew thirteen thousand Spaniards in a battle: another took fifty Towns: and a third enforced many States of the Country to sue for peace. Thus every one of them, or most of them, did some laudable service; and yet so, that commonly there were of Men, Towns, and People, new that rebelled, instead of the old that were slain, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to say, That the business in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato there departed, untill the Numantian War broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barthine House promised all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themselves and their obedient City: Masaniassa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the lesser Syrus: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Country the Numidian challenged, and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redress, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to allege, if the Judges had been impartial. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Country: Masaniassa himself, now very lately pursuing a Rebel that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for himself to pass through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise been questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniassa had herewith to justify his proceedings, especially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to understand by his Embassadors, what faithless people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent unto him from Hannibal, one that should persuade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon some supposition of his fraud; yet neither arresting him nor his ship had thereby afforded him means to escape. Hence the Numidians concluded, that certainly it was their purpose to rebel; and therefore good policy to keep them down.

As for the Country of Emporia: it had always, he said, been theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime unto the Numidian Kings: though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were known, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrentable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their City stood: or scarcely so much. For they were no better than strangers in Africa, that had gotten leave there to build up on so much ground, as they could encompass with an Ox-side cut into small throngs. Whatsoever they held without such a compass, was purchased by fraud, and wrongful encroachments. This considered, Masaniassa requested of the Senate, that they would not adjudge unto such usurpers, the Country sometimes appertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans having heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtful, that they could not on the sudden tell what to determine. Wherefore, because they would do nothing rashly, they sent over three Embassadors, of whom P. Scipio the African was one of the chief, to decide the controversy: yet secretly giving them instructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Masaniassa with a strong Army should quickly quickly prevail against those that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from stirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereby any disposition; but were prepared by little and little, unto their final destruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leisure to express the utmost of their hatred.

SECT. VI.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to War upon the Romans, by whom they hold themselves wronged and disaffected. Nabis besiegeth Gytheum, and wasting some part of Achaia. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace of the Romans, joins with the Ætolians. The Ætolians surprize Demetrius, and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, seize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætolians to think, that they who had promised unto themselves the whole spoil of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greeks; were not quite disappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most unregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have satisfied them, if their desires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their desire. But they were not to be pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly defeated, wherein they thought that they had unfeignedly wrong. Wherefore they deviled, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what means they best might right themselves; and give the Romans forrowful knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendship. To this purpose they soon agreed, as concerning all in one sentence; That they would not only perswade Antiochus to make war upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, to join all together in a new Confederacy: whose joyned forces could not in all likelihood, but far surmount those of the Romans Achæans, Rhodiens, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Ætolians took in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great carcers. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with persuasions, as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irresolute, and Antiochus willing to try first all other courtes, Nabis the Lacedemonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet threw himself of all other the most forward; and not flaying so much as to seek any good pretence, began immediately to lay siege unto Gytheum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had committed the Affairs of Laopœnia, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his duty: neither would they have flaid long from repeating his violence by open war; had not some of them thought it wisdom to ask Counsel of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintus, before they engaged themselves in a business of such importance. Whilit thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were advised by Quintus, to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman Forces, that would shortly be amongst them; Nabis was bold to give juster cause of complaint, by waiting their own Territory.

Philopœmen was then the Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been absent in Greece; making War there, for his minds sake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans, retired themselves, giving him leave to over the War at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should think best. He made all haste to relieve Gytheum by Sea; fearing lest the Town, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should be lost, if he used any delay. But Philopœmen was so bad a Sea-man, that he knew not a strong Ship from rotten. He made a Quadrime Gally his Admiral, that had four score years agoe been counted a gallant Vessel in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatus. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedemonians. Only it fell out well, that he committed himself to a light Pinnace or Brigantine, that fought better with her Wings, than with her Talons. For his Admiral Gally was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leaks, and took in water so fast, that she was fain to yield without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admiral, all were presently discouraged, and saved themselves with what speed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, he said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the siege of Gytheum, to stop the Achæans, if they should invade his Country. But upon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came unexpected; that Nabis would have been ready for them to loom. Or if he should come from Gytheum with any part of his Forces: yet was it thought that he must over-take them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost secretly, in a long troop, reaching some five miles; having Horle, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to bear off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly understood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the custom of Philopœmen, when he walked, or travelled abroad with his friends, to mark the situation of the Country about him; and to discourse what might befall an Army marching the same way. He would suppose, that having with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and forced in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were upon that ground encountered by a greater Army, or better prepared to fight. Then would he put the question, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? What piece of Ground it were meet for him to seize upon? and what manner he might best do it? In what fort he should order his men? Where below his Carriages, and under what Guard? In what fort encamp himself? And which way march the day following. By such continual meditation he was grown so perfect, that he did never meet with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himself and his followers: At this time he made a stand: and having drawn up his Kere, He encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His Baggage with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rock; encompassing them round with his Souldiers. The ground was rough, the ways bad, and the day almost quite spent; so Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; whereunto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was first to minister the like occasion of skirmish. Philopœmen understood this; and laid an ambush in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get between Nabis and Lacedemon, whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withal encourage the People to take Arms for the Recovery of their Freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwise would have been forced. Some Companies he made to stay behind, and shew themselves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceal his departure. But Philopœmen was not so to be beguiled. Heatly won the Camp, and gave chase to Nabis: whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopœmen conceived a right, that their fear and necessity would teach them to creep homewards, and save themselves when it grew dark. Wherefore in the evening, when he had gathered together all those of his light armature, which had followed the chase whilit it was day, he led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two most ordinary passages unto Lacedemon. So Nabis his men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopœmen Camp great store of lights; thought that all had been at rest; and therefore adventured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty days together after this, did Philopœmen waste the Country round about, whilit Nabis durst not issue forth of his Town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintus among them, labouring to make their party strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be solicited by the Ætolians. Very fair countenance they also made unto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoever he thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore unto him his Son: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receive other favours at their hands; and regain possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for War against Antiochus in Greece, whilit their Embassadors that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yield unto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage between Ptolomy and his Daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus ne King's Son, which hapned during the Treaty, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King from giving audience in person to the Embassadors; caused them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their answer as at their letting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficial unto them, they brought to pass during their abode in Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Livy rather think) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discouraged often with him, and blamed him for having thus tied unto Antiochus upon a causeless suspicion wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his virtue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadors; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded one, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged to be the most worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged unto himself. But Scipio, who thought his own title better than that it ought to be forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldst thou have said of Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the first place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto himself. Now whether this were to or otherwise, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadors, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to use his counsel. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly desired him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; he easily recovered his former grace and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to swear at the Altar, when he was a little Boy, that he should never be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain firmities: but to know thus much, that so long as he thought upon War with Rome, so long would Hannibal do him all good service; whereas contrariwise, if he intended to make peace, then should it behoove him to use the counsel of some other man.

The Ætolians, and their Friends, were less busie all this while, in making their party strong against the Romans, than were the Romans in murthering out their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vanquishing much of their own forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the Victory against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, unless he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian. But in vain. He understood the Romans and himself too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own Forces to the uttermost: as knowing that all the burthen must lie upon Antiochus and themselves without help from any, save only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilit they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to a resolution, the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, forth their vehemency a little; by exhorting them not to conclude faintly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready Answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion, Titus hearing this, thought the business worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans, it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panathenium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Charnage-field, on which to the ruin of the Country, the Romans and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Aetolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do, to send Embassadors to Rome. This should either plead their Right in the Senate, or (if their Right upon the place which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to fight the World in an uproar, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said or could say, it skill'd not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and lay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it news unto them to hear those comfortable words; that by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired: either as their Right, or else by way of Favour. For with such Terms had they been sealed once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This was only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore, without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intricated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Country at liberty, as also to decide the Controversies depending between the Romans and the Aetolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings mind before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know. If he came to their Camp in Italy upon the River of Tibris, Gentler words would have done better, as the Aetolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the War they referred unto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a General Assembly. The Apolloni (so were the privy Council of Aetolia called) went as hotly to work, as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a Plot how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as Friends, to conduct home a principal man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintus, had been driven to flee thence; but was by intercession of those that loved him, again recalled. His Aetolian Companions, that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereto they let in a Troop which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it self against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this Hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as Enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans, who more insolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoric they prevailed no more than they could do by plain force. For the Towns-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was slight. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good Friend was Lord of the Town, fighting himself King, but more truly by all Men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopemen had lately given him: since he durst not stir abroad; and daily expected the mischief that on all sides threatened him. Wherefore he sent Messengers, one after another, to the Aetolians: requesting them, That as he had not been flow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to find him what help they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, That the ravenous Aetolians were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now; For since Nabis his Mercenary Forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, and by so doing, to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose they sent either Alexameneus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Demetrius the Prætor, brought into the Council of the Apolloni, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make War with the Acheans, or to do ought else, save only what Alexameneus should command them: which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexameneus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words, telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were, like to find other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this Great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Antiochus, he bid that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the Forces that they could raise: But that they were very delicious at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had been long pent up in the City; and train them without the Walls: as if shortly he should employ them in work of Conquest, rather than Defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field: riding up and down with this Alexameneus, and no more than three or four Horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexameneus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Aetolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went aside to his thirty Horsemen, and bade them remember the task enjoyed them at their sitting forth; telling them, That they were all in case of banished men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexameneus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirty Aetolians never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where, instead of seeking revenges, they stood foolishly grazing as beholders. Alexameneus with his Aetolians, halted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Town was shortly in Arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royal Stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his Children, whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chief. So they fell upon the Aetolians that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the Sword. Alexameneus with not many of his Company, were slain in keeping the Citadel: and those few that escaped thence into Acadria, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them as bond-slaves. In this doubtful estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopemen came thither: who calling out the chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them as Alexameneus had done after he had slain the Tyrant: easily persuaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Acheans. Thus by the enterprise, no less dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians: and the small, but effectual travel of Philopemen, the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon that had hitherto been governed by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the Member of a Common-wealth, wherof the Name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

Antiochus, performed by Thoas the Aetolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. *Sundry passages between him, the Aetolians, Chalcidians, and others. Lewis Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Aetolians, with the civil Answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Acheans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired Peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their own Liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Ammander's, and an idle vanity by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal groves good counsel in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young Wife, and reveals away the rest of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two Thousand Aetolians, keeps the Straights of Thermopylae. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all Greece unto the Victor.*

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia, with Syneira and Lampfacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him: and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he delicious with all speed convenient, to shew himself in Greece: where he had been told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, that in all the Country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affections unto the Romans: That Nabis was already up in Arms: That Philip was like a Bandog in a Chain, desiring nothing more, than to break loose: and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to confer upon him the greatness, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this, the least part was true. Yet that which was true, made such a noise, as added credit to all the rest. Whilst therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africa, there to mock the Romans, and to give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Aetolian came over to him, and bade him lay all other care aside; for that his Country-men had already taken Demetrius, a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed to break the greatness of his virtue and fortune. This did deliver to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, that it was not expedient for him to divide his Forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit man to be employed in the Kings Service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said that the King should as greatly feel the loss of a Fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable Commander, if his fortune were bad, as if the time had miscarried under one of meaner quality: whereas, nevertheless, if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion that such a renowned Warriour should be always nearer unto the Kings Person, to give advice: which being followed, as often as it was found commodious, the good success would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the sovereign Command, even of the King himself. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the Vertue, that shined brighter than the Majesty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then, or after thought upon.

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a riotous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-side to Ilium; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrius. Eurylochus the Magnesian; the fame whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrius; was now the chief man, and ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Country-men, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this, and took it as a sign of good luck, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, That the Magnesian found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army somewhat like to that of Xerxes; they saw three hundred Ships; of which no more than forty were serviceable for the Wars, with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horses, and six Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree whereby they invited him into their Country. He knew before that they would do so; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met with him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyful entertainment as they could devise. Being brought into their Council, he made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he said, in true estimation, a sign of his good will: in that he said not to make all things ready, but halted unto their aid, even whilst the season was unfit for Navigation. Yet it should not be longer, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-Coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any Charge, Travel, or Danger, to follow the business which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their Authority out of Greece, leaving the Country free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the Chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all Provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs treat them, having thus lately come over unto their aid, unprovided of many necessities, that they would help him with Corn and other Victuals, wherof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) that they would yield unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their Forces. Here we may observe how vain a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himself, as did Antiochus, in a business of dangerous importance, upon the promised assistance of a State that is merely popular. For if the vehemency of Thous, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council; the Ætolians, for gain of two or three Towns, yea, for hope of such gain that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their Friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thous, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side, whom Thous would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen General of all their Forces: and thirty Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. These armed such, as readily they could, whilst it was in dispute where they should begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behind him at Demetrius. With these he halted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the Chief Citizens, issued forth to parley with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, fit Greece at liberty. But such liberty as might be true and useful, they said, would never be obtained; until by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mighty, every several Estate had where to find redress, of any prejudice. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them only, so to join with them in League, as that if either the Romans or He should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redress at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking they would enter into no new confederacy. That which they spoke of themselves, they could likewise affirm of all the Greeks: forasmuch as none of them paid any Tribute, was kept under by any Garrison, or lived otherwise than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto conditions which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered why the King should thus trouble himself to deliver Cities that were already free. But since he and the Ætolians requested their friendship; they besought both him and the Ætolians, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed:

parted: for he was not as then, strong enough to force them. But very soon after, he brought thither, a great power, which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the rest of the Island shortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Soldiers, that came over late to have defended Chalcis, repulsed themselves at Delion; a little Town of Ætolia, lying over against the Island: where was a Temple and Grove, consecrated unto Apollo, that had the privilege of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seen, whilst others were busied as they thought cause, without fear of any danger; as being in such a place, and no War hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himself in many vain Treaties of Peace, took advantage of their carelessness, and used them with all extremity of War. Very few of them escaped; fifty were taken, and the rest slain. Hereat Ænanius was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more just cause than before, to make War upon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation should persuade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reformed themselves until he should come among them: knowing that either if he came not, he must hold them excused for not daring to rise: or if he came, the Romans must pardon their just fear, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay far off, joyed within him in true meaning, like the Eleans, that always favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Acheans. Little reason there was, that he should think to draw the Acheans to his party. Nevertheless he assayed them upon a vain hope, that the envy which Titus was said to bear unto Philopemenus virtue, had bred a secret dislike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Council at Aginum, that spared not brave words, if the Acheans would have been so taken. The Kings Embassadors told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming; reckoning up the Dacians, Medians, Elymians, and Cadusians: names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought the more terrible. Then they held them what notable men at Sea, the Sydoniens, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning money, and all war-like furniture: it was, he said, well known, that the Kingdoms of Asia had always thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late War made with Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the case was too far different. Yet this most powerful King, that for the liberty of Greece, was come from the utmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Acheans, than that they would hold themselves as neutral, and quietly look on, whilst he took order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Ambassador, and further added, That in the Battle at Cynephalea, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Soldiers: but that both he and his Army had been there destroyed, had they not been protected by virtue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Council, and heard this: to which he made as fit answer, as could have been desired. He told the Acheans, That neither the Kings Embassador, nor the Ætolian, did greatly labour to persuade those unto whom they addressed their Orations, as to vaunt themselves the one unto the other. So as a man might well discern what good correspondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even such brags as here they made before the Acheans, who knew them to be Lyars, had the Ætolians also made unto King Antiochus: proclaiming the Victory over Philip to be merely their Act; and the whole Country of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they been flattered by the King, with such tales as his Embassador told even now, of Dacians, Aradians, and Elymians, and many others; that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for Bond-slaves, and good for little else. These divers names of rascal People, were he said, like to the diversity of Venison, wherewith a Friend of his at Chalcis, (no such Vaunter as were these Embassadors) had sometimes flattered him. For all that variety, whereat he wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; that so many pieces of one tame Swine, do oft after several names, with variety of favours. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the Great King by his present doing. He had, notwithstanding all this great noise, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Army he was slain in a manner to buy Victuals of the Ætolians: and take up money at Utiary to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Country; from Demetrius to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrius again. These were the Fruits of his: wherewith, since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded others; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much persuasion is needless. The Acheans did not love so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest objects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after news, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred between these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appears in the story fore-going. Now have they gotten each their Partisans; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwittingly: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have been desired, than that they might never find occasion to return with an Army thither again. And in this respect ought the Greeks to have fought, not how Smyrna and Lampacus might recover their Liberty, (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, until now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Country, as two Seas by an Isthmus, or neck of Land, might be kept from overflowing the Bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pre-

tenue for their seeking to make free those bare Astiatiques, who originally were Greeks; but the general applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of fear, that should move them to take Arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece could have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising jointly to assist the Romans with their whole Forces both by Land and Sea, whenever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stir against them: then had not only this quarrel been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Country, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Acheans were at this time, in a manner the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their Friends and Benefactors. All the rest gave doubtful answers of hope unto both sides: or if somewhat, as did the Thebans, were firm against Antiochus, yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his Enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bacchantes willingly received him, as soon as he entered upon their borders, not so much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had been somewhat hardly used. Antinander the Athensian, besides his old friendship with the Aetolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the Daughter of an Arcadian, that was an ill-headed man, and vaunted himself to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two Sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these Brethren, accompanied his Sister to the poor Court of Athens: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedegree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Aetolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high Parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his Forefather: it was for their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoof: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling them herunto, it behoved him to draw Antinander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by persuasions of himself or of his Sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own phrensy, in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his Subjects: or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his Friends, than he. Antinander were able to do good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynosephala, there to gather up the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians, whom their King had suffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedonians troubled not themselves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation, as intended merely unto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent unto the Romans: and gave them to understand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them whereinsoever they should be pleased to use him.

The Etolians, Magnetians, Enbassians, Bacchantes, and Athensians, having now all joined with him: Antiochus took counsel of them about the prosecution of the War in hand. The chief question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessaly, that would not hearken to his persuasions: or whether to let all alone until the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his own sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could allege: as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had been long call'd off, as a Vessel of no use, but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now utter, was even the fame which he would have spoken, had his counsel at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bacchantes, and other their good Friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than to many poor Elites, that wanting force of their own, did adjoin themselves for fear unto him, that was strongest for the present: and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alleging the same fear for their excuse? Wherefore he thought it most behooveful to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards have power to re-coyle, and forsake them all at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to sustain the Roman War with his proper Forces. Now that Philip might be easily persuaded to join with them, the benefit likely to redound unto himself, by their society, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope: For, Gid He, These Etolians here present, and namely, this Thos being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other motives which he then used to excite the King unto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly influence of the Romans: likened that King to some wild Beast, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would fain break loose. If this be so: let us break his chain, and pull down the grate, that he may regain his liberty, and satisfy his angry stomach, upon those that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwise, and that his fear be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoove us to look unto him; that he may not seek to please his good masters the Romans, by offending us. Your Son Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassy; let Seleucus be in readiness to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other side, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the present War in Greece. But now, regarding the managing of this great enterprise, wherein you are now embarked against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then given ear, the Romans by this time should have heard other news, than that Chalcis in Euboea was become ours. Italy and Gaul should have been on fire with War, and little to their comfort, they should have understood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I see what should hinder us even now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Army hither: (but in any case let Seleucus be laden come along with them, laden with Hosts of Vintners: For, at the case now stands, we have here too few hands and too many mouths) Wherefore let the one half be employed against Italy, whiffy you in person with the other half, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affairs of Greece, and therewithal make countenance; as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my advice: who though perhaps I am not very skilful in all sorts of War, yet how to war with the Romans, I have been instructed by long experience, both in their cost and mine own. Of this Council which I give, I promise you my faithful and diligent service for the execution: but what Counselsoever you please to follow, I will in any way be proffered. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said, he had spoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; save only that one was sent into Asia: to make all things ready there. In the mean while they went in hand with Thessaly: about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa that was chief of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Babius, a Roman Pro-pretor, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himself enemy unto Antiochus, whereby the fame of the succour coming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountain tops afar off: thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excusing himself by the time of the year: He brake up his Siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, Daughter unto a Citizen of the Town; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon War in hand. His great Men and Captains followed his example; and the Souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his Army had passed the Winter. But M. Atilius Galericus, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from his looseness of nocturnal Revels, by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Atilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nafica. The War against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise, He was no way so honourable, as Nafica, his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nafica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punic War, Crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very fear and desperation, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, that none other man than the very best, should entertain on old stone, which the Devil then taught them to call The Mother of the Gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Virtue, or good opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own province: or arrogate more unto himself, than his lot should afford him. This unpartial distribution of employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord. P. Scipio was therefore appointed to make War against the Bithynians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Atilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand foot, two thousand Horse, and fifteen Elephants. Pholomy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his Forces into Asia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolomy sent all Gold and Silver, to ward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good counsel. But he was too young, and dwelt too far off. So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refused. Unto Philip Embassadors, answer was made, that that his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themselves beholden to him, for the assistance that he should give to Antius the Consul. Masanius likewise, and the Carrhaginians, did drive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. For Each of them promised a great quantity of Grains which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And hercia Masanius let out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carrhaginians undertook to fit out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-money which was behind, and ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet: nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn, it was accepted, with condition that they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The haughty and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noise and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Astiatique Souldiers. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few Towns of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece: partly by fair words, and reason of the Rulers: partly by terror, that was like to prove their excuse when they should again forsake him. But King Philip and Babius having recovered many places and the Roman Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; he was glad to withdraw himself. Antinander fled out of his Athens: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip the Brother of Antinander Wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking-stock, and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thebans used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities one after another, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them layed behind, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himself to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out upon his Friends: and said, That they had betrayed him.

He had taken a great deal of toy during one half of a Winter, and spent the other half in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, he found all the promises of the Ætolians merely verbal: and himself reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wife man, yea, a very Prophet, that had fore-seen all this long before. Nevertheless, he sent word to the Ætolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no less than his. But the Ætolians had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who having promised to do great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyed with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Theor and his fellows had done their best in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He fixed upon the Straights of Thermopylae: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, until more help should come. Of the Straights of Thermopylae, there hath been spoken enough before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and focame onwards into Thessaly, were unable to pass that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece: unless they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handful of men, defended this passage two or three days together, against a world of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great miracles, and effect what he listed himself in Greece: did commit himself unto the safety of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his own Army. There whilst he lay, he sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at leastwise now to help, and keep the tops of the Mountains, lest the Romans, finding any by-path, should come down upon him. By this opportunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the few passages: by which only, and not without extrem difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort prepared to force the Straights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himself encouraged his Army; not only by telling them with what safe conditions Enemies they had to deal: but what rich Kingdoms Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battle. All that night Cato had a sore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, save only that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skillful guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up steepy Rocks, and crooked ways: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like metal to himself. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a Path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace, there was a fair way thorow the Straights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neither had this entrance of the Thermopylae been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any Travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best yet did it lead him to a bog at the end, which would suffer him to pass no further. So he lay'd there until day-light: by which he discovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him, and some of the Ætolians that were very near unto him, that were keeping the watch. He therefore sent forth a lusty Crew of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service: and willed them by any means to get him some Prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Ætolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently let upon the Ætolians, overthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found it, in a manner, a desperate piece of work to assault the Camp it self, which occupied the whole breadth of the Straights was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kind of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and poured down a shower of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought, at first, that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman Arms and Ensigns were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance: but all of them forsook the Camp and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badness of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this daies loss drove Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis: and from thence with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of suplicants. Briefly, in few daies all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only standing out, because they knew not what else to do. Neither did the Consul give them any reprieve. At his return from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to join with him against Antiochus: over whom, since the Victory was already gotten, He did gratefully unto the Romans their good success: and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, that the Consul should besiege Heraclea: and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his work hard; especially Philip, who lain would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Myne, were over-much hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclea, came thither, and told Philip, that the spoil of these Towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylae. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antiochus, that could find endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Roman Victory, got not Lamia himself: until such time as another Consul was ready to catch him of his charge.

The loss of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way faster than to desire Peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus, presently after his flight: intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those Forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece: or if any thing with-held him from coming in person, at leastwise to help them with money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour, but appertained unto his own safety: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He well considered of this, and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a sum of money, that might defray the charges of the War: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Theor, another of their Embassadors, he retained with him: who willingly stayed, till he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus: and made suit unto the Consul to obtain peace, upon any reasonable condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other business in hand; only he granted them ten daies of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata, willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata, they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans, wherefore Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to do so even betimes, than to stay till they were reduced unto terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing unto the faith, signified, in their using of it, little else than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans used those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speak in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation lately made to this purpose. Then, said he, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to go into Asia, upon any business, private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicaearchus the Ætolian, Menestheus the Epirot, A- minander the Athamianian, and such of his Country-men as have followed him in revolting from us. Whilst he was yet speaking, Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custom of the Greeks, who had yielded themselves unto his faith: not unto slavery. What? (said the Consul) Do ye stand to plead Custom with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chain. With that, chains were brought; and an Iron collar, by his appointment, fitted unto every one of their necks. This did so affright them, that they stood dumb, and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deal thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himself; and said, That neither he, nor yet the Apocleti, or ordinary Counsel for the Nation, were able to fulfill these Injunctions; without approbation of the general Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten daies respite; and had granted unto them Truce for so long.

This surceance of War, during ten, and other ten daies together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea: whilst Philip had been commanded from Lamia, that ere he might have won. Now because of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this War; He was desired to sit upon the Athamianian, and some other petty Nations their Borderers, whilst the Consul was busied with the Ætolians: taking for his reward, all that he could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Pertholia, Aperantia and Dolopia. For the Ætolians hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War, yet they could not endure to hear more talk of Peace. And it happened, that Nicanor about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with money and hopeful promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; and Philip having lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicanor conveyed into Lamia, by very unusual dexterity. But he himself being to pass further to the Assembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embassy; was very much perplexed about this his Journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman side, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good: but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or used ill enough by Philip. But it seems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his Servants to treat Nicanor friendly: and he himself being then at Supper, did visit him as soon as he rose up: giving him to understand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madness; forasmuch as they could never hold themselves contented, but would needs be calling strangers into Greece. That had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himself, being their Neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to have regard unto his friendship, whereof hitherto they never made any trial: for surely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signify unto his Country-men; and privately to hold in mind the courtship which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was always after very dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon; so as in the War of Perseus he made himself suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wife as he required it; he forthwith meant to prosecute the War against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus; whether he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length than the Romans had pre-conceived it; for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Acilius stood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have been a loser by yielding before it without Victory. So he lay'd there well-near all the following time of his Consulship; whilst the Macedonian King, and the Acheans, made far better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not higher, to reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrias, and with an happy course of Victory, subdued the Atamanians and others. The Acheans called to account the Eleans and Messenians; which had long been addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble a while. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other help when the Achean Pretor waited their Country, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth; to whom they sent word, That at his Commandment their Gates should be opened; but that unto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yield. A message from Titus to the Achean Pretor, did suffice to call home the Army, and finish the War; as also the peremptory Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Acheans, and become part of their Commonwealth. Such was now the Majesty of a Roman Ambassador. Titus did favour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their Neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Isle of Zacynthus; which had once been Philiis, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who sent a Governor thither. But when Aminander in this present War, was driven out of his own Kingdom by Philip; then did the Governor of Zacynthus offer to sell the Island to the Acheans; whom he found ready Chappens. Titus liked not of this; but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the Victory which they had obtained. It was bootless to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselves unto his discretion. So he told them that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponessus was the shell; and that, holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blows, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponessus, he went over to Naupactus; where Glabrio the Consul had lain two months, that might have been far better spent. There, whether out of compulsion which he had upon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philip thriving so fast; he persuaded the Consul to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitting themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians have made such earnest suit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had been sure to carry it in any short space, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; since the winning of that Town, wherein was the whole flower of the Nation, would have made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of these two: That either they should wholly submit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor War with any; further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much money; neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withal, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which, what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they desired to have it set down, in what points, and how far forth they should yield unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as Enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilst the Ætolians were pursuing their hopes of Peace, the Consul had little to do in Greece, and therefore took upon him gravely to set things in order among the tractable Acheans. He would have had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Eleans into the fellowship of their Commonwealth. This the Acheans liked well enough; but they did not like it, that the Romans should be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians; intending to make it an Act of their own meer grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholden to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans: into whose Corporation they were desirous to be admitted, and law that they should have their desire, without such compulsive mediation.

The Roman Admiral C. Livius, much about the same time, fought a battle at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admiral to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty Sail of Rhodian came after the battle, when they were following the Chase. The Kings Fleet was of better of Sail, but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as soon as he be took himself to a speedy retreat.

And such end had the first years war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, many many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians were glad to excuse themselves by fear; thinking themselves happy when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrary side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now fend to gratulate this Victory; and, in recompence of his good affection, had retired unto him Demetrius his younger Son; whom some few years they had kept as an Hostage. Also King Ptolemy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard he desired the Senate not to forego time; but to send an Army, as soon as might be, into Asia: promising that his assistance, whereinsoever it pleased them to use it, should not be wanting. This Ptolemy was the Son-in-law of King Antiochus; but he was the friend of fortune. He understood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The fame did Antiochus now begin to suspect, who had thought himself a while as safe at Ephesus, as if he had been in another world; but was told by Hannibal, That it was not so far out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soon be there, and make him try the chance of a battle for his Kingdom.

SECT. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Much troublesome business by Sea, and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes his Kingdom; with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handful of the Acheans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battle of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous Triumph over Antiochus, is furnished the Ætiauque, as his Brother was filed the African.

*T*hus Cornelius Scipio, the Brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with G. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate; and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Province; to be pleased, to the hazard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his Brother Publius, approved of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an unblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his Brother to the War against Antiochus, He himself would follow his Brother in that War, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the Controversie was forthwith at an end. For Antiochus relied upon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppose than Scipio: that had been victorious against that same great Worthy? But indeed a worse man might have served well the turn. For Hannibal had no absolute command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in confederation; where his wiliness was much approved, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance, as a sign of the freedom that he used in his censures, even whilst he lived in such a Court. Antiochus mulctured his Army in presence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may seem, to have made him wish, that he had been served by such brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with rich costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himself with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most covetous men in all the world: meaning that all this cost upon the backs of cowardly Ætiauque, was no better than a spoil to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easy to guess. The little use that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the use of his service, when he stood in greatest necessity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the War, about five thousand Volunteers, that had served under P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinquageme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was chosen Admiral the same year for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa, a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied Peace, had expected him once again at Naupactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town, but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlessly, as in a time of confusion, they had left unguarded the last year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden, was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten, when L. Scipio, his Successor, came with thirteen thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio in behalf of the Ætolians: entreating him to stand their friend, and help them in obtaining some tolerable condition of Peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to persuade the Ætolians, that they should faithfully, and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro; though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had been chafed from Rome. The Conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from War: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpful commodity which time should afford. So they obtained half a years truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another half years leisure of breathing. Hereof they were not more glad than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, which withheld the War from passing over into Asia.

The business of Stolia being thus laid aside, and the old Consul Labienus sent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Thessaly, intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Hellefpon. Yet they considered, that hereby they must commit themselves unto the loyalty of King Philip, who might either do them some mischief by the way, if he were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would he be unfaithful; though he were not so courageous, yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that even for want of Victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to return. He had promised them the utmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some trial; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post unto him, and observe his doings as he should take him on the sudden. The King was merry at a Tell and drinking when the Messenger came, whom he lovingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what provision of Victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made Bridges over the Rivers, and mended the bad ways by which they were to pass. With this good news Gracchus returned back in haste unto the Scipio's: who entering into Macedon, found all things in a readines, that might help to advance their Journey. The King entertained them Royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Hellefpon: where they stayed a good while, until their Navy was in readines to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admiral of Antiochus, was banished Rhodian: true to the King, and desirous of revenge upon his Country-men, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samus, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to do somewhat upon those that were so early in their diligence, before their fellows should arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work, and sent words, as in great secrecy, to the Rhodian Admiral. That if the Intence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in requital thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admiral grew so careless, expecting still when he should receive a watch-word from Polyxenidas that he himself was taken by Polyxenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and for fear of being discovered, resting one day in harbour by the way, came the second night to Samus: where, by morning it was ready to enter the Haven. Perceiving the Rhodian Admiral seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; & to guard the mouth of it: for that he saw no likelihood of defending himself by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed some Companies in another part of the Island: which falling upon the back of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies took him out of all order, and sunk or boarded all his Navy, five excepted, that by a sudden device made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Crescent upon two Poles, at the Beak-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the Enemy: who having not thought himself what shift to make against such unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto these desperate Gallies; for fear lest they should burn, together with themselves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some loss by Tempest: whereof Polyxenidas could not take such advantage as he had hoped: because, putting to Sea for that purpose, he was driven back again by the like foul Weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans also, with King Eumenes, repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery presented battle to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Ephesus. When he durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entertained by the Rhodians, or perfwaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindered by Storms at Sea; and another while by strong resistance made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus waited all the grounds about Elea and Pergamus: and leaving his Son Selenus to besiege the Royal City of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Army spoil the whole Country thereabout. Antiochus the Brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus, having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in fear: being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thousand foot, and an hundred horse of the Achaean: old Souldiers all, and trained up under Philippenus, whose Scholar, in the art of War, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes beholding from the Walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Selenus his Army which was encamped at the Hill-foot, seeing that none durst fall upon them, grew so careless: as otherwise than by spoiling all behind their backs, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Country. Diophanes therefore spake with Antiochus: and told him that he would go forth to visit them. Antiochus had no liking to this adventure: for he said, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achaean would needs have his will: and issuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers; they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himself quiet; they made a jest of his boldness; and laughed to see with what handful of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as fast as they well might: and he himself, with a hundred horse, brake out out on the sudden upon the station that was next at hand. Very few of the Enemies had their horses ready saddled, but moreover, or none had the hearts to make resistance: so as he drove them all out of the Camps and chased them as far as he might safely adventure, with great slaughter of them and no loss to his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the walls of the Town, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were very joyful; and highly magnified the virtue of these Achaean. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their Gates, to help the Achaean in doing what remained to be done. The next day Selenus encamped half a mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time, who quietly rested a while in his old station. When they had stayed many hours, looking who should begin: Selenus in fair order as he came, withdrew himself toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilst the enemy was in sight: but as soon as the ground between them hindered the prospect, he followed them in all haste, and soon overtaking them with his Horse, charged them in the Rear: so as he brake them, and pursued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldness of the Achaean, and the baseness of his own men, caused Selenus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of these Assaigues, Philippenus had cause to tell the Romans, That he envied their Victory. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his Souldiers brook themselves to Riot, as it had been in a time of great security: a good man of War might have cutt all their Throats, even as they were tripling in their Victualling Houses; which Philippenus said, that he would have done, had he been General of the Achaean, and not as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of business: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travel, brought almost nothing to pass. He had been at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himself with a few of his Horse and light Armature. Before Pergamus he left his Son, as before hath been shewed, and went to Elea: whether he heard that Emilius the Roman Admiral was come to bring succour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of Peace, about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Emilius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consent of this Treaty broke off. Then followed the overthrow newly mentioned, which caused Selenus to give over the Siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King, and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty sail, was beaten by the Rhodian, which was of like number. But of this Victory the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrian, did them in a manner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having his Victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight, yet made him a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the War, the last and greatest was a Victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admiral. The battle was fought by Myoniusus a Promontory in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourscore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last year. That his Armada should cover all the Shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians two and twenty: the Romans being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodians more light-timbered, and thin plankt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samus. For with Fire in their Prows they ran upon the Enemy: who declining them for fear, laid upon his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long lying, the Kings Navy hoysed sail, and, having a fair Wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three Ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had been remaining to defend those places that he held in Europe, he presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept, even till the end of Winter following, and having reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto terms of great extremity. He also gave over the Siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thoughts, save only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Antiochus, rather the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not only came to the Hellefpon, but had yielded unto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was also then in a readines to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before that he landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Country had been his already. The first news that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Ambassador that came to sue for Peace. This Ambassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining Peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perfwade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputes heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lysimachia, and was further purposed not to strive with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with War? If it was their desire that any other Towns upon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at liberty, or otherwise delivered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratify them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia, so as the bounds dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain, and it should be quickly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewise bear half the Charges wherewith they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to be too insolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their answer. These offers, which to the Ambassador seemed so great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should bear all the Charges of the War, since it began through his own fault; and that He should not only depart out of those few Towns which he held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the less, and keep himself on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Ambassador therefore saw that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promised a great quantity of Gold, together with the free restitution of his Son, who (it is uncertain, by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of Gold: nor otherwise to the Restoration of his Son, than upon condition, That it might be with making such amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the public business: He only said thus much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lyfmanthia, and suffered the War to take hold on his own Kingdom; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yield to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said he, tell your King in my name, That I would advise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may have Peace.

The King was not any whit moved with his advice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no less than if he had been already subdued: little reason there was, that he should fear to come to battle; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to avoid it he must give away. He had with him threethousand and ten thousand Foot, and twelve thousand Horse; besides two and fifty Indian Elephants; and many Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, according to the manner of the Eastern Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased to hear that the Consul drew near him apace, as one hastening to fight. But howsoever he was affected: He made a little shew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sick at Elea, He sent thither unto him his Son without ransom: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and withall not desirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own safety. Thus ought his bounty to be constant. Otherwise, it might be suspected that herein he dealt craftily. For since he could have none other ransom of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to do such a courtesy before the battle, as would afterwards have been little worth; than to stay until the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the Recovery of his Son; so as the joy thereof was thought to have been much available unto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He paid only thus much unto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other mends, than by advising him not to fight until he shall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his Counsel; and therefore withdrew himself from about Thyaira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Ephrus, unto Magnesia by Syphilus: where encamping, he fortified himself as strongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul, and sat down within four miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they few some; and were anon, with some loss, driven back over the River. Two days were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would pass the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbances; nor were at all opposed, until they came within two miles and an half of Antiochus Camp. There, as they were taking up their Lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps de Guards repelled. Four days together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came half way forward, and presented battle; which the King would not accept. Therefore the Consul took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, far from any Country of their Friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unless they would stain their honour by returning back, to Winter in a more convenient place; and to defer the War until the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was thoroughly periwaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the general Cry, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were too many Beasts to be slaughtered, than Men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed in discovering the Fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the Field again, and ordered the Battels: He also did the like; and advanced so far, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of four Legions, two Roman, and two Latine: in each of which, were five thousand and four hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points; the Roman, in the mean battle. All of them, according to their wonted form, were divided into Maniples. The Hopliti had the leading: after them followed the Principes; at such distance as was usual; and last of all, the Triarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Acheans, and partly such as belonged to Emmenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Utmost of all (save some five hundred Cretians, and some of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Emmenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Romans. The left wing was fenced by the bank of the River; the four Troops of Horse were placed there, though such help seemed in a manner needless. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians were left to guard the Camp. The Consul had with him sixteen African Elephants, which he betowed in his Rear: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men, as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater, and more courageous Beasts: whereas Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the several kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The main strength of his

Foot

Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the midst, and divided into ten Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly Beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their Backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fifteen hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks; then three thousand Barb'd Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Country, and accompanied by some other. All which Troops of Horse divided in their several kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather then to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoining unto these, were sixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings own Regiment; called the Argyrsphid, or Silverfields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on Horse-back, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Myfia, with four thousand Slingers and Archers of the Circassians, and Elymaeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barb'd Horse: as about a thousand Horse that were sent from Ararat, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations: and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troop; being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries; wherein late Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serve to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cissians, Pamphilians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymaeans, and many others, having also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himself commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principal Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The first onset was given by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrify the Horse; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Emmenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatened by them both. For with shoutings, and noises, and some wounds, they were driven out of the Field; and running back upon their own men, did the same harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this advantage, charged upon the left Wing: Whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shameful to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly be credible: that the Phalangiers, with such variety of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner as soon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himself, being in the left wing of his own Battle: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite unto him, weakly flinck with Horse, gave upon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Minimus, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, issued forth with all his power to help his fellows: and what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the Fight. Succour also came from the right Wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discovered the approach: He not only turned his Horse about, but ran away upon the spur without further tardiance. The Camp was defended a little while; and with no great Valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to have lost in this Battle fifty thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans there were not slain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horse: of Emmenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custody of Sardes, and the Cattle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Towns-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatness of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in those parts, without expecting Summons, yielded up themselves by Embassadors, whom they sent to the Romans, whilst they were on the way. Neither were many days spent, ere Antiochus his Embassador was in the Camp: having none other Errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose upon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his Brother, who obtained leave to make the answer, because it would be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their Charges in that War, they required fifteen thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should have confirmed the Peace; and the other twelve thousand in twelve years next ensuing, by even portions. Likewise they demanded four hundred Talents for Emmenes; and some store of Corn that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now besides twenty Hostages which they required, very earnest they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thas the Asiatic, with some others, who had stirred up the King to this War, delivered into their hands. But any wife man might easily have perceived that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principal demands; as no great Art was needful to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassador had full Commission to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to send immediately to Rome for the Ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volsus. The Asiatics desired Peace, but could not obtain it; because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make War upon the Asiatics; the other upon Antiochus in Asia. Now, though shortly there came news, that Antiochus was already vanquished in Battle; and had submitted himself unto all that could be required at his hands; yet since the State of Asia was not like to be so thoroughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care, Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by Lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon after this, came the Embassadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhedians and some others; yea, by King Emmenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the business in hand. Concerning the Peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputa-

tion: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned up his own defects, and comparing himself with Majusilla, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiful to him, than they had been to the Numidian, since they had found him a King, indeed, whereas Majusilla was only chief in title; and since, both he and his Father had always been their Friends, even in the worst of the Roman Fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He still referring himself to their courtly, and they desiring him to speak plain. At length he craved that they would bestow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needful, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giving Liberty to many of the Greek Towns that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Towns had been partakers with the King in his War, it was no reason that they should be Gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodian did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be true Patrons of the Grecian Liberty; and to call to mind, that no small part of Greece it self had been subject unto Philip, and served him in his War: which was not alleged against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point wherein they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus, was so great, as easily might satisfy the desires of all their Friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this, and very bountifully gave away so much, that every one had cause to be well-pleased.

Such end had the War against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the Pomp whereof exceeded in Riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flamininus, but of any that Rome had beheld until that day. Now forthwith as the furnace of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by some to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiaticus: which the fortune of his Victory had not less deserved, though the Virtue requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

SECT. IX.

The Etolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquished by the Roman Consuls, Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies: the Foeks of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipios: and that beginning and Faction among the Roman Nobility.

M. Ar. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius had the same charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now titled Asiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Etolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not sought to humble it self to the Roman Majesty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly terms than any other of the Greeks. The belt was, that so great a Storm fell not unexpected upon the Etolians. They had foreseen the danger, when their Embassadors were utterly denied Peace at Rome: and they had provided the last Remedy; which was to entreat the Rhodian and Asiaticus to become Intercessors for them. Neither were they so dejected with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well devolve, even upon helping themselves by repurchase of Countries lost, where they stood advantage.

Poor King Antiochus was in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedonia kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Asiaticus (besides that many of them bore a natural affection to their own Prince) having been so long accustomed to serve a Mountain Lord, that conversed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, used by the Captains of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their service towards his restitution. At the first there were only four of them: neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet assurance that all the rest would follow, made Antiochus willing to try his fortune. He was at the Borders with a thousand Etolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty Adventurers, having divided themselves into four parts, occupied, by the ready assistance of the multitude, four of the chief Towns in the Country to his use. The fame of this good success at the first, with divers Letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their best in helping forward the Action, made the Licutenants of Philip unable to think upon resistance. One of them held the Town of Theima a few days, giving thereby some leisure unto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence, and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all save two thousand behind him, and so came to Antiochus, a little Asiaticus Castle, that still was his, as being on the Frontier of Macedonia. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theima a while, to take a place lying over Argihea, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King, had the boldness to defend upon Argihea: for that they might perceive the Asiaticus, all along the Hill-sides, ready to come down upon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Antiochus came in fight with his thousand Etolians. The Macedonians were called back from wards Argihea, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own Borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Asiaticus and Etolians way-laid them, and purified them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plain flight, with great loss of Men and Arms, few of these escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Country, until Philip his return.

The

The Etolians having found the business of Asiaticus to cease, made an attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphibolians and Asiaticus. These had belonged unto their own Nation, and were lately taken by Philip: from whom they diligently revolted, and became Etolians again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and so did purpose still to continue. These took Arms at first: but soon laid them away; seeing their Neighbours ready to fight with them in the Etolian quarrel, and seeing their own King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of these Victories the joy was the less; for that news came of Antiochus his last overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his halting with an Army into Greece. Antiochus sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in despite, that he had recovered his own from Philip with such help as he could get. Neither seems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharp correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the business about which he came, and layd Siege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief seat of Epirus his Kingdom. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Etolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unless they would adventure to fight upon equal ground.

To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Etolian power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at Sea, and ready to be driven from their new Conquest, by Perseus the Son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphibolians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly fought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the mean while the Armenian and Rhodian Embassadors came, who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified by any violence of the Assailants, or danger that might seem to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend half his time about one City, and to be driven to leave unto his successor the honour of finishing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Etolians, and bade them seek Peace with as quiet intent, without thinking it over-dear, at a reasonable price, considering with how great a part of his Kingdom their friend Antiochus made the same purchase. He also gave leave to Antiochus, offering his Service as a Mediator, to put himself into Ambracia, to try what good his persuasions might do with the Citizens. So after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grievous to the weaker, but not unprofitable. The same Embassadors of the Armenians and Rhodian, accompanied those of the Etolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more useful in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grievous complaint about the loss of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the Peace, which those good Mediators of Rhodes and Armenia, did earnestly solicit. The Etolians were bound to uphold the Majesty of the People of Rome; and to observe diverse Articles, which made them less free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any People of Greece; they having been the first that called their Masters into the Country. The Isle of Cephalonia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaean, by filly prostituting their own right) that so they might have possession along the Coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbear the Country. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others might lay claim, there was set down an order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Roman Judges of their Controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedonia and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time War in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the same that had followed L. Scipio, of whose Victory, his acts were the confirmation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans: to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Wars, without regard of the great alteration that happened in Asia. From every of these he got somewhat, and by their quarrels, found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even loaded with booty, when, having fetched a compass about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-past deeds, than any present virtue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Or the Romans they had lately such trial, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves far the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safety, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Country, where those Enemies were very like to fear them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their own Nation, that had been Friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then was no counsel thought so good, as to forsake their Houses and Country, and with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high Mountains of Olympus and Margana. These Mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time, as also the natural strength being helped by such fortification as promised great assistance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them; or easily be repelled; and that finally, when he had stayed there awhile, Winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careless of furnishing themselves with calling weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came far otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of Arms, than impediment in disadvantage of Ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against Castles of Stones especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither excused in that manner of Fight, nor having prepared their Stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, other than those of a fit size. Finally the Barbarians, wanting de-

ensive Arms, could not hold out against the Arrows and Weapons of the Roman Light Armature; but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the Mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had none other way left, than to seek themselves headlong down the steep Rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their Wives, Children, and Goods, became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner were the rest of that Nation overcome soon after, at the other Mountain: only more of them saved themselves by flight, as having fairer way than their backs.

These Wars being ended, Fulvius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retain as Pro-consul, his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave Peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Arivarthes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for fear of the Roman Arms. He drew from them all, what profit he could; and laid upon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the League of Peace with Antiochus, where he swore, and received the Kings Oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellaspont, laden with spoil, as carrying him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many years extorted from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home rich in money alone, or Cattle, or things of needful use, which the Roman Soldiers had been wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous Houehold-stuff, and slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Musicians for Banquets; and in a word, with the seeds of that Luxury which finally over-grew and choked the Roman virtue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellaspont and the Kingdom of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians; either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stir. But when Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himself was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have been in his own Kingdom, if the People of Rome had not made War in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himself three thousand Talents, and fifty Ships of War, to take part with him, and the Asiatians, promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the War began: He thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their Victory, to give away not only the half of Asia, but Cherfoneus, and Esfimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himself they bestowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to go to Rome, and beg Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipios, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by Letters, whereby he made himself acquainted with the Wars in Spain and Affrick. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes took a surer way. For the Scipios had not the disposing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these upstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himself: yea, himself unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to with, that he had not so hastily declared himself against Antiochus, or rather that he had joined with Antiochus and the Asiatians, by whom he might have been freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness, the Asiatians were, he shall very shortly be urged to demonstrate at large. At the present it was believed, that the Thracians were by him set on to assail the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all advancing, and that fell, unexpected, upon the Carriages that were followed in the midst of the Army; whereof part had already passed a dangerous Wood through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting and the leaving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though less dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdom they had a fair march into Epirus; and so to Apolemia, which was their habitation of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax as an unworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation, it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One Clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his doing to have hindered the Peace with Antiochus, they said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the Calamity threatened by Sybil's Verber, unto those that should pass the Fatal Bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sybil's Prophecy threatened the Roman Captain, or Army, that should pass over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the first that marched with an Army beyond those limits: though the Victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a fort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his Racs, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we find not, that either Lucullus or Pompey, suffered any loss, in presuming; to neglect the bounds appointed by Sybil. Indeed the accom-accomplishment of this Prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sybil. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things that were denounced as like to happen upon the reduction of Sybil had in them any true foundation.

Time, there to take root, and get crevice by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemy to his Kingdom by Gabinus the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers have been well pleased to interpret Sybil in that Prophecy. Of the Sybiline Predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I think few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observation of the shameful Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the Books of Sybil, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent, That not only those Prophecies of Sybil, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the Books of Hermes, which have been such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whoever devised them) by the indifferet zeal of such as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with foreign powers. And in the same Rank I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Eusebius from no mean Authors. Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome, namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sanctis, that is, To Simon the Holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publick, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Senecca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an argument so famous. Wherefore I am persuaded, that this Inscription, Simoni Deo Sanctis, was, by some bad Circumstance, taken amiss in place of Simoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the Goods of one Vitruvius a Rebel, had many Ages before been consecrated Simoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chapel they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman Letters, or by some spoil that time had wrought upon them it might easily come to pass, that the words should be mis-read, Simoni Sanctis, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our Faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over-hardly on a well-painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbered among a few of the richest, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those moneys which the Commonwealth had borrowed from private men in the second Pannick War. So long was it, that Rome had till some feeling of Hannibal; which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, until the heat of an inquisition, then raging there, in should be allayed. The two Scipios were called one after another, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, known to Ptolemy. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with Bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great Train of his Friends and Clients, with which he passed through the midst of the Assembly, and offered himself to speak. Having audience, he told the People, That upon the same day of the year he had fought a great Battle with Hannibal, and finished the Pannick War by a signal Victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Laws; but intended to visit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both at that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty business of the Commonwealth. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Prince and great One of their City might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the People, even the Officers of the Court followed Scipio, leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them excepting their own Slaves and a Cryer, by whom ridiculously they cited him to judgement, until for very shame, as not knowing what else to do, they granted him, unrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their Suit, but enforce him to submit himself to a disgraceful trial; he willingly relinquished the City, and his unthankful Romans, that could suffer him to undergo so much indignity. The rest of his time he spent at Literum: quietly with a few of his inward Friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year in this voluntary banishment; it is uncertain. The relation of his dying in the same year with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his private behaviour at Literum, render it probable, that he out-lived the Tribunes, and of his Accusers; who meant to have drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoever it was: the same Tribunes went more than to work with L. Scipio the Asiaticus. They Proposed a Decree unto the People,

O o o o o 2 touching touching money received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed Author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect Virtue, temperate, valiant, and of singular industry; frugal also, both of the publick, and of his own; so as in this kind he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with Bribes, yet was he unmerciful and unconformable, in seeking to increase his own wealth, by such means as the Law did not permit. Ambition was his vice, which being poisoned with envy, troubled both himself and the whole City; whilst he lived. His mean birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chief estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own rank, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had been at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury. That he had not brought into the common Treasury some Vessels of Gold and Silver, gotten in his Camp of Arctium. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipios, grew partly, 'besides his general spite at the Nobility' from his own first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some check that was given unto himself, in the African Voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his dislike of the Consul had Husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore either not caring what lies he published, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the virtue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue Reports against his General, whose noble deeds confuted sufficiently the Author of such false Tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded, nor thought upon by the Scipios, whilst it was nourished by their Enemy, brake out upon advantage, especially against L. Scipio: his Brother being dead, or out of the way. A fever inquiry and judgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was soon condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For Non-payment his body should have been laid up in Prison; but from this rigour of the Law, he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suit against the African to be let fall. In his Estate, which was confiscated to the use of the City, when there neither appeared any sign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had been condemned to pay; then fell his Accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. Kindred, Friends, and Clients, made such a Colledion for him, as would have set him in better Estate than before, if he had excepted it. He took no more than such of his own Goods, as were of necessary use, being redeemed for him by his near-est Friends.

And thus began the Civil War of the Tongue in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been,

or not been much regardable until now, since the Punick War. Security of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient Employment, were effectual helps to the kindling of this Fire; which first caught hold upon that Great Worthy, to whose Virtue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extrem danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude in such quarrellousness, grew to perfection, they that found themselves overmatched by their Adversaries at this kind of weapon, began to make opposition first with Clubs and Stones, afterwards with Swords; and finally, proceeded from Frayes and Murders in the Streets, unto battle in the open Field. Cornelia, Daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare Virtue, that in honour of her two Sons was more commonly named, Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two Sons, whilst they were but young, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their Friends: by those whom they opposed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At that time the Senators began to take upon them Authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Senatus all the whole power of the City, under this name. Let the Consuls provide, that the Common-wealth receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus, a popular man; whom by such Authority, they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius a famous Captain of theirs, was so condemned; who by force of Arms returned into the City; and murdered all the principal Senators: whereupon began the Civil Wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himself absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a man of higher Spirit, to affect and obtain the like Sovereign Power, when by the like Decree of the Senate, he was provoked. It is true, that never any Consul had finally cause to rejoice, of his having put in execution such Authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in passing their Laws, by hurling of Stones, and other violence, made the City stand in need of a Sovereign Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as Enemies, those that would not submit themselves, when they were over-topped by Violence in the House, did compell Cæsar, or give him at least pretence, to right himself by Arms; wherewith prevailing against his Adversaries, he took such order, that neither Senate nor People, should thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principal Citizens, lost their own freedom, and became Subjects unto the arbitrary government of One: suffering this change in three Generations; after this beginning of their insolent Rule, wherein they took upon them as the highest Lords on earth, to do even what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto complete Greatness, nor believed of her self; as if she had, whilst a King fate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the Reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this confirmation of her honour was thought upon betimes. Now it was effected, the sequel will discover.

The Second MACEDONIAN War.

SECT. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were Associates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for War, obtains Peace at Rome, by his Son Demetrius: of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

AFTER the Overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Emperor King of Persepolis, the Common-wealth of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the same Laws and Magistrates as formerly had been, before the arrival of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the public Declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute Vassals to the People of Rome. For of those five Privileges belonging to a Monarch, or unto Sovereign Power, in whomsoever it rest; namely, To make Laws, To create Magistrats, To arbitrate Peace and War, To beat Money, and To reserve (as the French call it) le dernier Ressort, or the last Appeals, the Romans had assumed four; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeal, or last resort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselves within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King or Common-wealths declined, or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities utterly dissolved. Nevertheless it is true, that they had their own Laws, and Officers of their own ordaining; yet so, as neither the Laws were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrats so free, as that they had not therein especial regard unto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of servitude the several Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankful for their deliverance from a Yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skilful in the Art of Flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chief hope of thriving; or as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindful of their own honour. But Emmanuel living further off, and being most obsequious unto the Romans, was not of long time questioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of War and Peace, together with the diversion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to hold his own even as he listed, until they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdom bordered upon the Nations by them not thoroughly subdued. For upon the first reason (as well as upon his own high desires) were they very loving unto Majauria, and to his House, until Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africa; as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others, holding people in subjection unto themselves, by the Ministry of Kings: especially of such Kings, as were useful and obsequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and shewed himself not forgetful of his own former greatness, the honour of his Race, or the high reputation of his Kingdom. But such Magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their Estate, and a valuation of himself against them: which in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore notwithstanding that he had lately given passage to their Armies thorow his Country, prepared the ways for them, and furnished them both with Victuals and other things needful, to transport them over the Helle-spont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet upon the Complaint of Emmanuel and the States of Thessaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Places and places demanded by any of his Neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered; by direction or licence, even from the Romans themselves.

These Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdom: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his Dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: In which Province it is said, * That innumerable Medals of * High of Gold have been found in the age of our Grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three

Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his Estate in Europe) fell to Selenus Nicator by right of War, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right Polymachus thought them his own, when he had murdered Selenus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdom of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crown, together with the most part of Thrace, all those heaps of Land newly thereunto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the Son of Demetrius and his Successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gauls being over-past, those Countries which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their Liberty; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to find these advantages; and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischief commonly done done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies : by shutting up the ways, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdoms : and by occupying Lysmachia, with some other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Country, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own Estates : yet forasmuch as these Towns were, in a manner, at absolute liberty, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of Justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Asians, of wrongful usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysmachia. Hereto he made a good answer. That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians : who, as soon as he thence withdrew his men, did seize upon the Town, and ruin it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Amis and Maronea : That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdoms. But this Plea had not availed him, in the dispute about Lysmachia : and in the present question, the Romans were not without their own titles : since Antiochus had gotten all the Country therabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former War : and since they, by their Victory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate : referring it unto their disposition, Whether Amis and Maronea should be set at liberty : whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Demetrius : who begged them as an Appendix to Lysmachia and Cleronius, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive by the demeanour of their Embassadors towards him : who sitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every controverſie. Nevertheless he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintain his Right unto these Towns : wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the War against Antiochus and the Asians : wherein, whatsoever he had gotten for himself, was now taken from him by their Embassadors : and would they now deprive him of those two Towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdom, which he had gotten to himself out of the ruins of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruins, Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deal more ? By such allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at least to gain time, wherein he might bethink himself what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had been their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their Liberty, he took counsel of his own passion ; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gave order to Gnumatius, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sack the Town, and use all cruelties of War. This was done : but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice than could have been feared, of these proceedings ; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an account. He would have removed the blame from himself, and laid it even upon the Maronites : affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one another's Throats. And hereto he willed the Embassadors to enquire among the Maronites themselves : as well knowing, that they who survived, were either his own Friends : or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more severe, and more thoroughly informed in the business, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, That if he would discharge himself of the Crime objected, he must first Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his Spirits, and said, That Cassander should be at their disposition : but concerning Onomastus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requested them not to press him, since it stood not with his honour to lightly give away his Friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales : He took order to have him poisoned by the way. By this we see, that the Doctrine which Machiavel taught unto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischievous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they have performed the mischief, was not of his own invention. All Ages have given us examples of this goodly policy, the latter having been apt Scholars in this Lesson to the more ancient : as the Reign of Henry the Eighth here in England, can bear good witness ; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same unjust Law that himself had devised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the War which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger Son Demetrius as Embassador unto the Senate : giving him Instructions how to make answer to all Complaints, and withal to deliver his own Grievances in such wise, that if ought were amis, he might it appear that he had been strongly urged to take such course. The sum of his Embassage was, To pacify the Romans, and make all even for the present. Demetrius himself was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate, as having been well approved by them, when he was Hostage in Rome : and therefore seemed the more likely to prevail somewhat ; were it only, in that regard would be born unto his person.

Whilst this business with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst he, by his readines to make submission, seemed likely to divert from himself some other way the Roman Arms : the same Embassadors, that had been Judges between him and his Neighbours, made their progresss thorough the Grecks : and took notice of the Controversies, which they found between some Estates in the Country. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Acheans. It was objected unto the Acheans, That they had committed a grievous slaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedemon : That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the Walls of the City : as also further, in changing the Laws, and abroabrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lyortas the Prætor of the Acheans, made answer, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now took upon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselves committed that Murder, whereof themselves they laid the blame upon others : the Acheans having not only called those unto judgement, that were supposed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans : and these Plaintiffs having slain them, upon private, though just hatred, as they were coming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing down the Walls of Lacedemon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance : who, having persuaded his Citizens to defend their Town and Liberty by their proper virtue, did inhibit unto them all kind of Fortifications : as the Retracts and Nets either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedemon had woful experience) of Tyrants and Usurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these Walls, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his Ordinances : and governed the City by their own lawless Will. As for the Acheans : they communicated their own Laws, which they held for the best, or else would soon change them, and take better, unto the Lacedemonians : whom they found without Laws, or any tolerable form of Policy. For conclusion, Lyortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embassadors. That he and his Country-men held it strange, being Friends and faithful Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and give account of their actions, as Vassals and Slaves unto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at Liberty : why might not the Acheans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did bulie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon ? For if the Romans would stand upon their Greatness, and intimate, as they began, that the Liberty of their Friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratify it : then must the Acheans have recourse unto those Agreements that were confirmed by Oath, and which, without perjury could not be violated ; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal Gods. To this bold answer of Cyortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state upon him, he pronounced more like a Matter than a Judge, that if the Acheans would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whilst they might ; they should be compelled with a mischief, to do what was required at their hands : whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Acheans, which groaned to hear the Lordly words of Appius. Yet fear prevailed above indignation : and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadors reformed some banished and condemned men : but the Roman Senate, very soon after, did make void all judgements of death or banishment, that had been laid by the Acheans upon any Citizen of Lacedemon : as likewise they made it a matter of dispute, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedemon should be suffered to continue a member of the Achean Commonwealth : or, taken from them, and made, as it had been, an Estate by itself. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, that they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates should be suffered to enjoy : though by contributing Sparta to the Council of Achaia, they discovered no less, as to them seemed, the love which they bare unto the Acheans, than the power which they had over them.

Into such slavery had the Grecks, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themselves, by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsel and persuasions of many wise and temperate men among them ; they had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Celts, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans ; and, by seeking Patronage, made meer Vassals : to instruct them, in the like case they should expect : yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policy prevail with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore brought Revenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearful servility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon : who, though he saw the Grecks very far from daring to stir against those, by whom both he and they were kept in awe ; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans, by freeing from his subjection, had made his implacable enemies) in heavy affliction all the Country would be his, whensoever he should take Arms, as shortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired Ratification of Peace ; though qualified with much indignity from following. He had been lovingly used at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being confounded with the multitude of Objections, where to his youth, unskilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer : it was permitted unto him, to read such brief notes as he had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather Satisfaction ; more for Demetrius his own sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodness in the Defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his Son, together with some insolence of his Son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans : did increase in Philip his hatred unto Rome, and bred in him a jealousy of his too forward Son. To let him forward in these passions, there came dayly new Embassadors from Rome ; some bringing one Commandment, some another, and some requiring him to fulfill those things which had been imposed upon him by their fore-goes. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance ; and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands : yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadors young Demetrius was conversant : rather perhaps out of simplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect ; yea a great deal more than was pleasing to his Father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the Elder Son of the King, should not succeed unto his Father, but that the Diadem should be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended, not only Perseus, but Philip himself : who suspected his younger Son, as more

Roman than his own; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealousy, it will not be amiss to speak of some memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

SECT. II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrel in the Continent of Greece, had of late been so peremptory with the Acheans; that they seemed not unlikely to take part against them in any controversy that should be moved. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed unto the Achean Common-wealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Society, with purpose to set up again the Estate of their own, severed from communion with any other. This was the device of some that were powerful in their City; who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpose, and not over-strictly affected in the business, were careful to seek occasion of reducing things to such pass, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessity of standing out, and of not returning to the Achean League. And hereupon they began to do some acts of hostility, whereby blood should be drawn, and either side so far exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Praetor of the Acheans, levied such Forces as he could in haste, and went against them. Many principal Gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readiness to wait upon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; He had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that usually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Messenians, whom he charged, and forced to run. But whilst his Horse-men were too earnest in following the chafe; there arrived by chance a supply of five hundred Messenians, which gave new courage unto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again: and with the help of those, who very seasonably came to their back, compelled Philopœmen Horse-men to turn back; Philopœmen himself had long been sick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatness of his courage would not suffer him to be negligent of their safety, which had so willingly adventured themselves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his Horse-men to pass along by him in a narrow Lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom, the reputation and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrify from approaching over near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being cast to the ground by a fall off his Horse, and being withall in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet scarce believed their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought this news to Messene, was so far from being believed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible! They caused him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might satisfy themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune; and in commemoration both of his virtue, and of the singular benefits by him done unto them, especially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his delivery. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his Faction were detestous hater to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and that would never leave any disgrace, or injury done to him, unrevengeed. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong Vault under ground, that had been made for the custody of their Treasure. So further they let him down fast bound, and with an Engine laid an heavy stone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not stayed long, ere his Enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him with a cup of Poison, which Philopœmen took in his hand; and asking no more than whether the Horse-men were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his mind, he laid it was well: and with a cheerful countenance, drank his last draught. He was seventy years old, and weakened with long sickness, whereby the Poison wrought the sooner, and calily took away his life. The Acheans, when they missed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindful to preserve their own lives, than to look unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilst they were devising what to do in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Acheans was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement; and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene: who coming thither, and laying Siege to the Town, enforced it in short space to yield. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himself, and made an end of his own life. The rest of those that had been parties in the Murder: were compelled to wait in Bonds upon the ashes of Philopœmen that were carried home in solemn pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slain at his Funeral, as Sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. St. Martinus a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. He would have inter-meddled in this business of Messene, had not Lycortas made short work, and left him nothing to do.

About the same time was T. Quintinus Flamininus sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bythinia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the War against Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spiteful enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy worthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flamininus. For upon the next conference between the King and Flamininus, a Troop of Souldiers were directed to guard and environ the Lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deviled some secret Salles under ground to save himself from any treacherable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fortified, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practice as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and merciless hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way to escape, nor counsel to resort unto, he took the poison into his hand, which he always preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest Dificals of adverse fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: *I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old Man. This Victory of Flamininus, over me, which am disgraced, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be counted among the rest of his heretical deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how far the ancient Roman virtue is degenerate and corrupted. For such was the nobleness of their Forefathers, as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them battle at their own door, they gave him knowledge of the Treason intended against him by poison: whereas that of a latter race, have employed Flamininus, a man who hath heretofore been one of their Confidants, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Law of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cutting the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to revenge his Fidelity, drank off the poison and dyed.*

In this year also (as good Authors have reported) to accompany Philopœmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African; these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the World had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been the Prince of the Corthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the Roots. But he was so strongly croit by a cowardly and envious Faction at home, as his proper virtue, wanting publick force to fulfill it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the common misery of his Country and Commonwealth.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envy of our equals, and jealousy of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-wealths, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of Men of War, and great Captains, being no Kings. For besides the envy and jealousy of Men, the spoils, rapines, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastations and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Moline the Marshal of France confess, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without revulsion, it were in vain for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: (seeing the crucifixes by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. However, this is true, That the Victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardice of the Nation against whom they serve. For above of others, whose Virtues have raised them more the level of their inferiours, and have furnished their envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we find many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Amylius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read not of many that escaped these rewards. Yet long before these times, it was a Legacy that David bequeathed unto his Victorious Captain Joab. With this fear Alexander feared Perseus, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Heretofore Valentinian the Emperour invited Armenius: who, after many other Victories, overthrew Attalia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battle for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was stricken in the World, for there fell of those that fought, beside raw-awakes, an hundred and fourscore Thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Procopius. That in killing of Armenius he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Armenius, murdered the perjurant Valentinian flew Armenius, murdered the Emperour; which he never durst attempt Armenius living. And, besides the loss of that Emperour, it is true, That with Armenius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a far worse had Bellerophon; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torn out of his head by Jysimian: and he died a blind beggar. Nay, also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion; was disgraced by Justin. That rule of Caio against Scipio, hath been well observed in every Age since then, to wit, That the Common-weal cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turks drawn another Principle; and indeed, a Turkish one. That every War-like Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of War, than suffer his own glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bajazet Acomat; Selim (travelling Mysaphas) and most of those Princes bring to ruin the most of their Vassiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Guastaflo, who drove the French out of Naples and Evindrudus Cortez, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with Nettles, not with Laurel. The Earls of Egmond and Horn had no heads left them to wear Garlands on. And that the great Captains of all Nations have been paid with this Copper Coin; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary; it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of War. This conflicts. Yet mult it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of them, by the help and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unreasonable, that the Tyrants, which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities; and the Licutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traiterously cast down their Masters, and stepped up into their seats; were not all of them good men of War: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which underevery were ascribed to their personal worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatness by the greatness of their warlike virtue; is far more in seeming than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by the help of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius; but he was a Coward; and, with a barbarous cruelty, seldom found in any other than Cowards, he flew first the Children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face; and after them Mauritius himself: This his bloody aspiring was but as a Debt, which was paid unto him again by Heracles: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjustly gotten; and set it on his own head. Leontius laid hold upon the Emperor Justine, cut off his Nose and Ears, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge he had left his own men of War. Justine having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippus commanding the Forces of Justine, murdered both the Emperor and his Son. Amalassus, the Vassal of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Ausgastus, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Prisoner. It were an endless and needless work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius, how many others have been repaid with their own cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captains to make themselves Kings, have by Gods Justice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the best way of thriving by the practice of Arms, is to take what may be gotten by the spoil of Enemies, and the liberality of those Princes and Cities, in whose service one hath well deserved. But scarce one of a thousand have prospered by this course. For that observation, made by Solomon, of unthankfulness in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City, and a few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poor and wise man therein, and he delivered the City by his wisdom: but none remembered this poor man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to have been indebted for great benefits: which the unwiser sort of them think to favour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are often times couzened and abused; which proves that weakness to be in them indeed, whereof they glory; thus the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountiful in giving thanks, yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captains have made, by enriching themselves with the spoil of the Enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it; and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most injuriously to rob them of their own, upon a false supposition; that even they whose hands are most clean from such offences, have purloined somewhat from the common Treasury. Hereof I need not to produce examples:

that of the two Scipios being so largely recited.

In my late Sovereigns time, although for the Wars, which for her own safety, she was constrained to undertake, her Majesty had no less cause to use the service of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many years had: yet according to the destiny of that profession, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest, and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any service by them performed. And, that her Majesty had many advised, valiant, and faithful men, the prosperity of her affairs did well witness, who in all her days never received dishonour, who in the Cowardice or Infidelity of any Commander, by her self chosen and employed.

For as all her old Captains by Land died poor men, as Malbey, Randol, Drenry, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Contable, B. webber, Barkley, Bingham, and others: so those on a later and more dangerous employment, whereof Norris and Vere were the most famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did; those I say with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many travels and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posterity. As for the Thomas Barrrough, and Fergine Berry, L. Willoughby of Essex, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the World their Titles and Estates.

That her Majesty in the advancement of her men of War did sooner believe other men than her self, a dislike unto which many wise Princes, besides her self, have been subject; I say, that such a confidence, although it may seem altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not in some sort accuse her of weakness. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actions are so unprosperous, and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martial-men seldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnify a profession far more Noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving less honour and reward to men of far greater deserving, and of far greater use than themselves.

But his Majesty hath already paid the greatest part of this debt. For besides the relieving by Pensions all the poorer sort, he hath honoured more Martial men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred years.

He hath given a Coronet to the L. Tho. Howard for his chargeable and remarkable service, as well in the year 1588, as at Caliz, the Islands, and in our own Sea; having first commanded as a Captain, twice Admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in Chief. His Majesty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy and Burley into Earldoms; and created Sidney Vicount, Killes, Rufel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons for their Governments and Services in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

SECT.

SECT. III.

Philip, making provision for War against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own Subjects. His Negotiation with the Balthare. His cruelty. He suspects his Son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his Brother Perseus; and shortly after slain by his Fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his Sons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

Quintus Marius the Roman Embassador, who travelled up and down, seeking what work might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to use the utmost of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedonia. At his return home, that he might not seem to have discovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoever they enjoyed him: yet so, as it might appear, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meer necessity should enforce him thereto. He added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King, did wholly tend unto Rebellion, about which he was devising. Now it was to be noted, that Philip much repeated him of his faithful obedience to the Romans; and foretold their intent, which was, to get his Kingdom into their own hands; which safety of their honour, if they could find convenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparent) by what means soever. He was in an ill case: as having been already vanquished by them; having lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; having Subjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could devise, against the necessity which he daily feared. Such of his own People as dwelt in the maritime Towns, and gave him cause to suspect that they would do but bad service against the Romans, he compelled to forsake their dwelling, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence these were transplanted, he filled with a multitude of the Assians, whose faith he thought a great deal more assured against those enemies that were upon alluring the Balthare, a strong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the River of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would help them to root out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Country. These were like to do him notable service against the Romans; being not only stout fighting men, but such, as being planted in those quarters by him, would bear respect unto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, must be the utter extirpation of the Kingdom of Macedonia, whensoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to persuade those Balthare, by hope of spoil, and other incitements, unto a more desperate Expedition, through Thyria, and the Countries upon the Adriatick Sea, into Italy it self. It was not known who should withstand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peradventure some others through whose Country they were to pass, would accompany them against the Romans: yet it only in hope of spoil. Now to facilitate the remove of these Balthare from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedonia; a long and tedious journey unto them; Philip with gifts did their Wives and Children: which carried with them did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to pass. And thus he sought means to strengthen himself with the help of the wild Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; since he was not like to find assistance from any civil Nation, about the whole compass of the Mediterranean Seas. But these devices were long ere they took effect: so as the Balthare came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpose. In the mean time he neglected not the training of his men to War, and the exercise of them in some small Expedition against those wild People that bordered upon him, and stood worst effected toward him.

But these his counsels and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own House. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wills to forsake their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meet for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it self within words: he having done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himself over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evil therefore would soon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindictive nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traitorous malice; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needless. In his rage he caused men to dye; among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the People, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more general, when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistaking all alike whom he had injured, thought himself unlike to be safe, until he should have massacred all the Children of those Parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical then perhaps could have been desired, gave him cause to think (as they could not in reason think otherwise) that, not without vengeance poured on him from Heaven, he felt the like misery in his own Children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger Son. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention between the brethren, but only to cherish the virtue and towardsness of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extreme jealousy in the Fathers head. If any custom of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their Apparel, or the unglynt contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jested at in ordinary discourse and Table-talk; Demetrius was fure to be proficely on fire, detesting and flouting them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadors as often as they came, gave his Father cause to think, that he was no fit partaker of any counsel held against him. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder Son Persius: who caring so much lest his Brother should split between him and the success, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his Father. Persius was then thirty years old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in Valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspicions, that were much incited by the cunning practice of his elder Son, a slight occasion made the Fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Mulier and ceremonial lustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. This manner of it at the present was thus. They chift in twain a Bitch, and threw the Head and Trunk, with the Entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Army was to pass: This done, the Arms of all the Kings of Macedonia, from the very first Original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two Sons: after him came his own Band, and they of his Guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other Ceremonies, that Army was divided into two parts: which under the Kings two Sons, charged each other in manner of a true Fight; using Poles, and the like, instead of their Pikes and accoutred Weapons. But in this present Skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the Victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did over earnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a tokening of their good success in a greater trial. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, until Persius hid his side at length recoyled. Persius himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad prejudice: but his Friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort; who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the counsels of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, advertised their Services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this Victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him, as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the Brethren was that day to kill his own Companions, and each of them had spits in the others Lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Persius his Intelligencers behaved himself so indifferently, that he was taken and well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his Men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of Wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his Brother, and see what cheer he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his Brothers man: yet he would leave none of his train behind, but forced them all to bear him company.

They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to prevent all danger. Yet there was such good espial kept, that this their coming Armed was forthwith made known to Persius: who thereupon tumultuously locked up his doors, as if he stood in fear to be assaulted in his House. Demetrius wondered to see himself excluded, and faced very angrily with his Brother. But Persius bidding him be gone as an Enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with an entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder Brother accused the younger unto the Father of them both. Much there was alleged, and, in effect, the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the main point of the accusation, and which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this Murder, and would perhaps also dare to undertake a greater, upon consideration of the Romans; by whom he knew that he should be detested and born out. For Persius made them, as if the Romans did hate him; because he bore a due respect unto his Father, and was sorry to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his Brother against him: as also that they sought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a Letter, sent of late from Titus Quintinus to the King himself: whereof the contents were, That he had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further do well to send him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honourable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsel was given by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should wait upon his Brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become Servants to this young Traitor Demetrius. Here to Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Persius, that converted matters of pastime, and what was done or spoken in Wine, to such an accusation, whereby he fought his innocent Brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bear him, he said that it grew, if not by his own virtue, at leastwise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, he were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase it. In this wretched pleading there wanted no such passions, as are incident to Fathers, Children, and Brethren, besides those that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a Father, though a jealous Father. That he would conclude nothing upon the excess or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better observation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein he may seem to have dealt both justly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gave himself over wholly to Persius: using to little conference with his younger Son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him present, nor near unto him. Above all, he had especial care to learn out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintinus.

sins, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Phileas and Apelles; men whom he thought no way interested in the quarrels between the Brethren, though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a Letter, said to be written by Titus (whose Seal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it. That his youthful and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices unprofitable, against his elder Brother, which yet should never take effect: for that Titus himself would not be Author, or Abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuse did forcibly persuade the King to think his Son a dangerous Traitor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in custody, made them as if he had pitied the Estate of the unhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered unto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to fly secretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in safety from his Father and Brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could find at home, of bettering such claim as he had in reversion unto the Crown of Macedonia. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the escape, and in the mean while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his Son to death, without further expense of time. It was thought behooful to make him away privately, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proof sufficient, at least of the Kings despite against them, if not of his meaning to renew the War. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince of his life. This accursed Minister of his kings unadvised sentence, first gave poison to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedy: who villainously accomplished their work, by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedonia.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own blood. The houles of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heels; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of Sovereign rule, or fear of losing it. By the like unnatural hatred, had almost been cut off the lines of Polomy and Seleucus: which, though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their Kingdoms thereby grievously dilapidated. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that unpart-family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it self to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of mere slavery: whereof a principal cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples, but is said to have propounded the last of them to his own Children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himself of an unmerciful nature; and therefore unmet to be a good persuader unto kindly affection. The Murders by him, done upon many of his Friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satisfying of his boundless Appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both Strangers and Subjects of his own; did now procure Vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his own poison. After the death of his Son, he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equal balance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole process. His only remaining Son Persius could do little to still the pleasure which he took in being freed from all danger of competition: as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause than the remove of those dangers which he had lately feared than at other times; when he, as having accomplished the most of his duties, left off his usual trouble of mind, and carcass of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted than in former times, by those that well understood the difference between a rising and a setting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, more expecting his death, and for a scarce enduring the remissions of such expectations. This bred in the King a deep Melancholly, and filled his head with suspicious imaginations: the like whereof he had never been slow to apprehend. He was much vexed; and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued to be true to Philip, that he grew thereby hateful to Persius; and thus becoming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Commellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Persius would not vent it self, and give cause to the King, until the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the Treason objected; as also that Phileas and Apelles (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flamininus, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of Forgery in the business: made diligent enquiry after the truth. In this doing he found one Xyebus, a man most likely to have understood what tale dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xyebus, for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had been employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of business. No marvel if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnatural practice of one Son, he had so wretchedly cast away another, far more virtuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himself, and withal against the Authors of the mischief. Upon the first news of this discovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy; Phileas was taken; and either forasmuch as he could not deny it when Xyebus confronted him, yielded himself guiltily, or else was put to torture. Persius was now grown stronger, than that he should need to fly the Country: yet not so stout as to adventure himself into his Fathers preference. He kept on the Borders of the Kingdom towards Thrace, whilst his Father wintered at Demetria. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious Son, took a resolution, to Aliene the Kingdom from him, and confer it upon Antigonus. But his weak body, and excessive grief of mind, so disabled him in the Travel thereto belonging, that e're he could bring his purpose to effect, he was constrained to yield to nature. He had reigned about two and forty years: always full of trouble, as vexed by others, and of which vexing himself with continual Wars; of which that with the Romans was most unhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wife Prince would have desired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befall him, he might thank his own perverse condition: since his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an Estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it ealie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsel. Wherefore he was justly punished by feeling the difference between the imaginary happiness of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilst yet it was on, ly drawing near, was fore-figured unto Perseus, by Calpurnius the Physician, who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the sudden, and took possession of the Kingdom: which in fine he no less imprudently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

SECT. IV.

How the Bastard fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his Reign. Some Wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniassa cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make War without their leave obtained. The Treason of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks Friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of Warring upon him.

IMmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Bastard into Thrace; where order had been taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnity of the Country. This Compact was friendly observed, as long as no other was known, than that Philip did live to recompence all that should be done, or fulfilled, for his Service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he took any care what became of the enterprise: then was all dash and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford fo good markets unto their strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastard would not be contented with reason, but became their own Carvers. Thus each part having lost their rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew careful of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows; and the Bastard had the upper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plain Countries. But the Victors made little use of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some overthrow, received by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extrem bad weather, which is said to have afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, save thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their Voyage, I do not find. It seems that by the careless using of some Victories, they drew loss upon themselves: and finally took that occasion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perseus, he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his Reign, to embroil himself in a War so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his mind to the settling of his Estate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himself, as the condition of his affairs should require, either for War or Peace. To prevent all danger of Rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Antigonus.

To win love of his People, he fate personally to hear their cases in Judgement, (though herein he was fo over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his virtue of Justice to be no better than feined) as also he gratified them with many delightful spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all necessity of War with Rome: and therefore made it his first work, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the League; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and Friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greeks, and other his Neighbours, but was rather herein too excessively bountifull, that it may seem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruin, he became grasping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the mairing passion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into fo many shapcs, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in Wars against the Spaniards and Ligurians; People often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new Rebellion. They also conquered Libria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Ilyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever since the Victory) a heavy hand; and suffered Masaniassa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their own, to take Arms: from which they were bound by an Article of Peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Masaniassa therefore had great advantage over them, and was therefore had great advantage over them, and was therefore ignorant how to use it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoever he desired, e're their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and fo he did use them again and again: with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniassa had won some Land from the Carthaginians: which afterward Syllabus won from from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for love of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Aspidochus his Father-in-law. This did Masaniassa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whose judgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Estate, to use all manner of submissive obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this injury, when Masaniassa came upon them again, and took from them above seventy Towns and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in the League: That they should not make War out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now though it were so that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniassa, invading their Country, howsoever he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was Confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to bear defensive Arms against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that they might have fairer Justice; or be suffered to defend their own by strong hands; or at least, if right must wholly give place to favour. That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how far forth Masaniassa should be allowed to proceed in these outrages; if none of these Petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them understand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gave them Peace; and vouchsafe to insist on them such punishment as they themselves in honour should think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Judges, than continually to live in fear, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Nimidian Hang-man. And herewithall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping; in hope to move compassion.

Here we may behold the fruits of their envy to that valiant house of the Barchinies; of their irresolution in prosecuting a War so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole Estate in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they Servants, even to the Servants of those men, whose Fathers they have often clased, slain, taken and sold as Bond-slaves in the Streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africa and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman Peace, which Hanno too often and so earnestly desired. Only they want Peace with Masaniassa, once their Mercenary, and now their Master, or rather their tormentor, out of whose cruel hands, they beseech their Masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourish in rich prosperity as might have been their own. But the Romans had far better entreated Varrus, who lost the battle at Cannæ; than Hannibal, that won it: was used by the Carthaginians; they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extrem want, to set out an Army into Spain, at what time the enemy lay under their own Walls. These were no Car- thaginian virtues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their tears may less from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themselves able to right with Masaniassa; which estimation of their Forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into compassions with Rome. Wherefore they obtained not such leave as they sought, of defending their own right by Arms: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained, they presumed to far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an ealie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Scipio was then in Rome, and had not as yet crowned his triumph. He therefore was called before the Senate, where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions how to deal in that business. Only it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Council divers Nights, in the Temple of Asclepius; whereupon he himself was dispatched away to Rome, there to treat the Senate, that these common Enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be over-much trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, That for Masaniassa his sake, they had done, and would do, whatsoever was reasonable, but that it stood not with their Justice, to allow of this violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those Lands, which by the Covenants of the League were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they dismissed Scipio, besetwining on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should do well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian War was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for fear of urging them unfavorably to Rebellion) or Masaniassa, at whose hands they expected no little help. So were they added both by the Carthaginians and Masaniassa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better oblige in the future; by Masaniassa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished; he made none other account, than that all Africa round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his own.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perseus. They willed him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. This he entertained kindly at first, until (which fell out e're long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, until the Bastard were thence gone; though he protested, that he had no more to them. Afterward they cried narrowly into his his doings: and were no less ill contented with good offices, by him done, than fondly of his rebuffs, than with those wrongs, which (they said) he did unto other home. Where he did harm to any; they called it making War upon their Friends. Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking Friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his Subjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquisite torments flew Esphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seems that Esphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a People without strength to resist the Macedonians; and therefore unlikely to be presumed far, unless either they had been extremely provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whosoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soon allay it, and reclaim them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angrily this presumption of the King: even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his own Rebels at home. Fain they would have him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians: whereunto had he humbly done his neck, they could themselves have done the part of Masanius; though Emmer, or some other in for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were such as made it unlawful both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take Arms without their licence first obtained.

To the same pass they would also fain have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their Adherents, even such as had entered into League with them upon equal terms: whom they usually rewarded with a frown, whenever they presumed to right themselves by force of Arms, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Acheans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their own Carvers; and whose hope of extraordinary favour at Rome, caused them the more willingly to refer their causes to arbitration. For when they went about to have chastised the Messinians by War; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times they were reprehended, even with Lordly Threats, when they took upon them to carry any business of importance, by their own power, without standing unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheless upon submission, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in usurping the practice of Arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard Lesson, they were such untoward Scholars, that they needed not, not long after felt, very sharp correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed unto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being desirous to humble the Acheans, refused not only to give them such aid as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League between them; but further, with a careless infidelity, rejected this honest and reasonable petition. That the Enemy might not be supplied from Italy, with Victuals or Arms. But with not content, the Fathers, as warred with dealing in the affairs of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmo-

This was presently after, the death of Philopomen: at what time it was believed, that the Commonwealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distress: were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Acheans had utterly subdued the Messinians far sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Acheans; but many entered into their Corporation; then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City.) That they had straightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messina. Thus thinking, by a feigned gravity, to have served their own turns, they manifested their condition, both to set on the weaker against the stronger and more suspected, and also to assume unto themselves a Sovereign power, in directing all matters of War, which discernibly they would have seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make War, whether offensive or defensive, though it were against more strangers; without interposing the authority of the Senate and People of Rome: unless peradventure, sometimes they winked at such violence, as did help towards the accomplishment of their own secret malice. Now these Roman Arts, howsoever many (for gainful or timorous respects) would seem to understand them, yet were generally displeasing unto all men ended with free Spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent City in Greece, having neither Subjects of their own that might rebel, nor power wherewith to bring any into subjection; nor want of more noble arguments, wherein to practice their eloquence, that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remaining free from all trouble, until the War of Mithridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratuulators of the Roman Victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdoms, that with over-nice diligence, strove to preserve their Liberties and Lands from consuming by piece-meal: they were to be devoured whole, and swallowed up at once. Especially the Macedonians, as the most unpliant, and wherein many of the Greek began to have affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to break.

Neither Perseus, nor the Romans, were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his near Neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his Subjects, could not want good information of all that might concern him, in their affairs. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopomen had long since foretold, of the miserable subjection, whereto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subjection, whereto already they were become come obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publick, to fall out with the Romans; yet all of them had the care to choose among themselves none other Magistrats, than such as effected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, be flatterers of the greatness which kept all in fear. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soon be at an end; when honesty, and love of the Common-wealth, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly advertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors; whom all men knew to be little better than spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors (of whom every City in Greece had too many.) As were men unregarded among their own people, and therefore more like to speak maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or Charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own desires of employment. But it is hard to conceal that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to find Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the same business: chose one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embassy. By their making choice of such a man, one may perceive the advantage, which malicious wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the plain sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome business of the weal-publick. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition, that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himself therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alledging what was meetest in justification of his People, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the settling of their Authority, among his froward Countreimen: if they meant not wholly to forego it. For now there was taken up a custom, to stand upon points of Confederacy, and Laws: as if these were principally to be had in regard, any injunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Acheans, both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged or hindered from obeying the Decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if he, and some other of his opinion might have their wills: who could not to affirm, That no Columns, or Monuments, erected, nor no solemn Oath of the whole Nation, to ratify the observance of Confederacy or Statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans would the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themselves, that the multitude refused to give ear unto such persuasions. For howsoever in popular Elates, the found of liberty used to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, seeming never so bad, were sure by their fo doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increase apace, and they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore, strange how the Fathers could so neglect the advancement of those, that fought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman Majesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greeks; who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwise of little account or desert, only for having uttered some brave words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obnoxious, and by cherishing their Friends, to make their party strong; resolved to follow this good counsel, in every point; yea to depress all those that held with the right, and to set up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callicrates, that advised men to be such, and so affected, as he was, in their several Common-wealths. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a joyful man: having brought his Country into the way of ruins, but himself in the way of preferment. Nevertheless he forbore to vaunt himself of his eloquence used in the Senate. Only he so reported his Embassy, that all men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such Arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Acheans: in which Magistracy, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousness unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now, as the Romans by threatening-terms won many flatterers, and lost as many true Friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberal gifts, and hospital promises, to assure unto himself those that ill could brook his Enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his Enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with Factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonian, and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not sufferable, that a King, no better than their Vassal, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of the Trepasses: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them just occasion to make War upon him. Perseus having finished his business among the Dolopians, made a Journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was: the worse for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himself; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or Letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his Father, might be buried with his Father's since his own meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his Neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleased better, if he had behaved himself after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of Hostility in his passage. Yet, as if he ought not to have taken such a journey, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the love of the Acheans: which his Father had lost, that by a solemn decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no less than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a Decree. For howsoever Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them cause to abhor him, yet in the private administration of their Estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general consent, they resolve to forsake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preservation of concord among them, to use all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Country towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messengers, they might make themselves suspected by their new Friends; but the continuance of this Decree, beyond the time of War, and when all danger of innovation was past, was unskillful, as no inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Acheans escaped no good fruit. For, although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst lift foot therein. Hence it came to pass, that their bond-men, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their Masters could not fetch them, ran daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loss of such, as made of their Slaves very profitable use. But Perseus took hold upon this occasion: as fitly serving to pacify those, whose enmity vain he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all these Fugitives, to send them home again: and wrote unto the Acheans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken pains to restore back their Servants, so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily understood, and his Letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly received by the Prætor, before the Council. But Callicrates took the matter very angrily; and bade them beavited what they did: for that this was none other, than a plain device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he took upon him somewhat liberally, to make the Acheans before-hand acquainted with the War, that was coming upon Perseus from Rome. He told them how Philip had made preparations for the same War; how Demetrius had been made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of Peace. Briefly, He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans: the invasion of the Bastarne upon the Dardaniens; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he advised them to expect the event of things, and not over-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Prætor's brother: That Callicrates was too earnest in lo fight a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himself too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perseus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate: and that he had lovingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so why might not the Acheans, as well as the Ætoliens, Thracians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheless Callicrates was grown a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not over-stiffly gain-say him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and answer made the whilst, That since the King had only sent a Letter without an Embassador, they knew not how to resolve. Better it was to say thus, than, that they were afraid to do as they thought most reasonable and convenient. But when Perseus here-with not contented, would needs urge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they fain, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience, which was proof sufficient (to one that could understand) of the condition wherein they lived. For hearkening to this advice of Callicrates; they were soon after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonians; though hitherto no cause of War was given.

SECT. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamum was buffeted with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemns his enemies the Rhodians; with the cause thereof. The unusual stoutness of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his device to poison some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War against him, and send him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this War.

EUMENES King of Pergamum had been troubled about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his Neighbours. He had taken Pol. Leg. the right course, in making first his complaint to 56, c. 50. the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise. That they, by their Authority, would end the business of his content. But in conclusion, by the help of the Kings Perseus and Antiochus, he ended the War himself; and brought his enemies to seek and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to give them. After this, being at good leisure: he began to consider how the affairs of Macedon stood under Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very very great: and therefore he was glad to understand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy was as great, and withall notorious. Now, besides his ancient and hereditary quarrel with the Macedonians; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate store on his Father and him) began to wax every where flake; whilst Perseus, either by his currying favour, or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despite of this indignity, He stirred up the Lycians against the Rhodiens his old friends; and in helping their rebels, was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, in open War. But final pleasure found he in these poor and indirect courses of revenge.

The Lycians could not be fayed by his Patronage from severe and cruel chastisement, given to them by the Rhodiens. This rendered him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of Hostility, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece: they not only continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Acheans, as too unmeasured, mis-befitting them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he need not to have regarded, had he been not too vainly ambitious) he felt him; especially for his being over-serveable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdom; which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redress hereof, he thought it vain to strive any longer with bounty, against such an Adversary, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to persuade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompensed with some piece of the Kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where, though he had little to say, which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange novelty; and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the balance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarne into Dardania, that of Perseus himself against the Dolopians, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermeddling in business of his Neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spy. He said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse of his own, many in a readiness to entertain ten thousand Mercenaries for ten years, Arms to furnish a number three as great: The Thracians his friends at hand, ready at a call, to bring him Soldiers as many as he should require; and that he prepared Victuals for ten years, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoil, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Selenus the Son and Successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his Daughter Laudice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Selenus offering the match. That King Transas of Bybina, by earnest suit, had gotten to Wife the Sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassadors from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envy to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to hear of amity with Philip, were now grown marvelously well affected to his Son. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Athyrbis the Thyrians, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdom, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify unto the most, saying, That he thought it his duty to forewarn them: since it would be to himself a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italy making War upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly to believe that the Romans stood in fear of Perseus, lest he should sit upon them in Italy. Nevertheless, forasmuch as they loved not to make War without fair pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their Associates, but of further hurt intended; great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautify their intendment. Now though it were so, that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embassadors, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of Hostility against them, their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done, were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own Kingdom, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtain their own right and security? Toward this justification of the War, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well known, helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speak; and with matter of rectification. The vanity, either of him, or some about him, seems to have discoloured all: when the weariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable show of some fearful apprehensions; against which, it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore earnest Audiance was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to Rebellion. The Rhodiens had with great pomp conveyed by Sea unto Perseus, his Bride Laudice; which friendly Office, as the Macedonian bountifully required, so the Romans delightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were sitting themselves in their obedience to the People of Rhoder, Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gave new life to the Rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to alien quite from their own protection, any People or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them aligned unto those of Rhoder, not as meer Vassals, but as Dependants and Affiliates. For proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the Commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the Victory against Antiochus. Heret Eumenes, Masani, the Asians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome, for increasing the number of their Subjects, had cause to find themselves aggrieved, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like Decree, those their Subjects might easily be made their Fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so that all men knew the prudent meaning of the Senate: which was only to plague the Rhodian for their good will to Perseus, by letting them and the Lycians together by the Ears. The Fathers could therefore find reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made to the Rhodian Embassadors, which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King for much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carefully as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them of find cause of anger: for whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacify them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plain language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might favour of Hostility; but that, if his travel in this kind proved vain, then would he be ready to defend himself by Arms, and stand to the chance of War, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus hurt felt might, at this time, think to speed better by a few of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman servitude: it was not expedient that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general expectation, and the good affection born to him, which therein depended, by discovering his too much weakness of spirit, unanswerable to a work of such importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune, which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soon after on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer show of reason to make War upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there do sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus desirous hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his own hands of a most mischievous Enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout Rufians to do the Murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud-wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence assault the Kings, whom they forely bruited with great Stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work, such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all lure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their own Companions, who could not hold pace with them; because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveyed away to the little Isle of Epis, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his Death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his Brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took, or would have taken to wife (supposing it be-like a matter of State) Sratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the Widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbered among the rare Examples of brotherly love, That when the King returned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his duty, as in former times, received none other check, than, That he should forbear to marry with the Queen, until he were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of their matters, but bequeathed at his death, unto the same Brother, both his Wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his Brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in special favour, when Eumenes kill into their hatred) were in good readiness to have transferred the Kingdom from his Brother to him. By such concord of Brethren was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld; as might also that of Macedonia have been, if Demetrius had lived, and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad, when he understood that his Ministers had both accomplished his will, and had fared all from discovery. But as he was deceived in the main point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived, so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly conceived the less matter. For he had written to one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this business: and they, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Embassador, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Laminius a Citizen of Brundisium; who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, laden with dangerous secrets, had secretly sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himself. Brundisium was the ordinary Port for Ships palling between Italy and Greece. There had Romanius a fair House, wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable persons, both Roman and Macedonian, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his Hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with Friendly Letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming, he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings Secret. The fun of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality; lity; sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this Employment: for far less the virtue of this Medicine should be tried upon himself. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Romanius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to see again: and therefore, besides that the Kings denial ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himself; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other; yet withal professing, That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the Rightfulness of making War upon him, but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proof which might have been easy (than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very suitable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private offences, it gave him no privilege: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make War upon Eumenes their Confederates: that is, if he might not send men to waste the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Towns: might he not Rufians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the League to destroy the Senate by fire or famine, than by violence of the Sword, was it lawful for him to do it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed War against him; and sent Embassadors to denounce it unto him, unless he would yield to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to have been so confident in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he desired not War, yet he did not fear it: or at least he thought by show of courage, to make his Enemies more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them do their Errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference in the Isle of Samos, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia about some ill purpose. In regard of all which, they contemptuously required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the evidence, brought against him by Romanius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-beloved, and well-befriended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage, calling the Romans greedy, proud, insolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meer spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the League made between them and his Father; and renewed by himself indeed only for fear, but without them to descend to more equal conditions; whereupon he,

In the form of the League between Philip and the Romans, as is set down by Polypion, we find no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconvenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livy infers a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden to make any War abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman Confederates were included in this Peace: whereby every one of the Neighbours round about Macedonia, entering shortly into League with Rome, did so find the Kings hands, that he could no more make War abroad, than if he had been restrained by plain Covenant. And thus might that seem an Article of the Peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not bear Defensive Arms, without their permission: then had Perseus very just reason to find himself aggrieved. For since they had allowed his Father, without controul, to make War in Thrace, (whilst they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why they should now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chastise his own Rebels? or to repulse an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause in very mild sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the League as unjust, he missed occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three days. But either he should have been less vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could give him to undertake this War, he should courageously have managed it, and have fallen to work immediately, whilst the Enemy was unprepared; not have lost the opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse Peace than the former.

SECT. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greeks to join with them in the War against Perseus. From the Greeks good success in that War. The timoroni of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador declares him with hope of peace. The losses. The taking the Field, and miss part of Thessaly. The Forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what Affiliates the Romans had in this War. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his Victory; flies for Peace, and is denied it by the Vanquished. Perseus having the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the country lying about Tempe. The Bacotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the War against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their Friends; for whole ease case the Senate makes Provision, having heard their Complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behindhand in Provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confidence of good pretences to make the War; whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their Cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the Action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strengths were such as would prevail in the end; they hastily embraced the fair occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of time. Neither was this their unreasoning a small help, towards examining the Greek and others: who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greek, or other Eastern People should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonians: such was the diffidence between the several Estates; howsoever the generality of them were inclined the same way. Nevertheless, Embassadors were sent to deal with them all; and to crave their help against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no less ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the Liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for falshood sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greek were now well acquainted with such Roman courtship; and understood that not only such as made refusal, but even they who might seem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their help to the Romans: the Acheans and Rhodiens, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duty. It is strange that men could be so earnest to fit up the side, whereof they gladly would have seen the ruin. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus, of the Nobles and Rulers, if some few vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest, and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Historians was one: who though he judged the Victory of Perseus like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that so the Greek might recover perfect Liberty: for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically hindered, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Acheans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their fear may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himself. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few Companies brought over-Sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the Enemy fair, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every small thing would serve to terrify him: and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans Power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of Peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had afflicted him; little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his Army; taking by force or composition some few Towns, and soliciting all to join with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he fought all means of pacification; and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martins, the chief of those Embassadors, and a man of more fineness in cunning than was usual among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King entertained and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereunto Perseus made none other answer, than the time which they could have made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a Truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his desires, which was to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in a readiness, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could be in Greece. But by the interposition of this Truce, he no way increased his Forces; he suffered his most convenient season of winning upon the Enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vain hope. Yet was he pleased herewith: as it had been with some Victory: publishing a Copy of the Disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodiens, of whose good will to him he was best persuaded; not only to let them know how much he was superior in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans; if perhaps notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied Peace. These were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than mere vanity: his own safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his fearfulness might seem excusable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the Greek; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of necessity, that was partly their own: had it not been his Office; who took upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his more and more lying being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were careful not to put their Shoulders to a falling Wall. The Rhodiens, among whom he had many stout Partizans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Bacians also, who had entered of late into a strict society with the Macedonian, renounced it now, and made the like with the

Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yielded themselves as Vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission under a general form; but caused their several Towns to make covenant apart, each for it self; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Commonwealths, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated into one, under the City of Thebes. This work, of separating the Bacians from Thebes their Head, was more than Aegleus could effect, or Epinomondas would follow, then when all Greece followed the Macedonians. So far were all provided to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Epinomondas, and a few brave Citizens, than was the society with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Macedonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the Truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where, vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed again by the Senate; with commission to deal as he should think expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was given to them, for that they thought not plainly for how their Matter was delayed; but neither excuse nor intreaty would serve their turn: the Senate being resolved before-hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to such Commanders as might not, by reason of some Custom, enter the City) and had only the short warning of Eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courtship serve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest; but it was a likely mean both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his bulwarks, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Consul was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have roused Perseus, and have made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting Pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himself Tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdom, than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel prevailed, which also was the wisest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly and wisely followed. Hence now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what should have been done long ago. He caused all his Forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Town in Macedonia. All being in readiness, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his Guard, set forward to Citium. His Army he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, whereof about twelve thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his own Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their Ancestors, the intolence of the Romans, the goodness of his Cause, the greatness of his Provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedonia there came likewise Messengers, offering to help him with Money and Victuals, according to their several Abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own provision would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he issued forth into Thessaly: knowing that the Romans were to pass thorough that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Thessaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well-manned; and some he won by force. Of these last was Nyle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the Assailants. It was taken by reason of a Sally, which the Towns-men rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entered pell mell with them at the Gate. All cruelty of War was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate, So Velatie and Comus (Towns of much importance, especially Comus, which stood in the straits of Olis, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Siccrinum, a Town seated on the foot of Mount Olis; where he rested a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of Auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes & Attalus his Brother came to him in Thessaly, with four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the several Estates could afford: or thought expedient to send, which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad, Masanius sent thither his Son Misigenes, with a thousand Foot, a many Horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his Affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this War; perhaps because Eumenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Perseus was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Proimus (though Proimus was then young, and under Tutors) had business of their own: the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian; yet each of them promised help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Geminus the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick wherewith M. Lucernus, the Roman Admirals Brother, served him, for this his counterfeited good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrrachium, uncertain to what purpose: all which Lucernus took away, after a very kind sort; making them to believe, That for none other end than to serve the

So long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a consequence of good pretences to make the War: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their Cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the Action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strengths were such as would prevail in the end; they hastily embraced the fair occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of time. Neither was this their unready (as a small help, towards examining the Greeks and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greeks, or other Eastern People should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonians: such was the diffidence between the several Estates, howsoever the generality of them were inclined the same way. Nevertheless, Embassadors were sent to deal with them all; and to crave their help against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no less ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the Liberty of Greece. The Embassadors used as gentle words for sedition sake, as if they had stood in doubt that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now well acquainted with such Roman craftiness; and understood that not only such as made refusal, but even they who might seem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this business was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their help to the Romans: the Acheans and Rhodiens, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duty. It is strange that men could be so earnest to set up the side, whereto they gladly would have seen the ruin. The vulgar sort was every where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest, and most honest, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Historians was one; who though he judged the Victory of Perseus like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wished he the Romans ill to thrive, that to the Greeks might recover perfect Liberty: for his endeavours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appears that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Acheans, and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their fear may be justly imputed unto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himself. He had undertaken a War, whereto the benefit should redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few Companies brought over-Sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the Enemy fair, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every small thing would serve to terrify him: and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans Power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of Peace, to take revenge at leisure upon those which had afflicted him: little cause was there why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his Army; taking by force or compulsion, some few Towns, and soliciting all to join with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit unto the Roman Embassadors. Q. Martins, the chief of those Embassadors, and a man of more fineness in cunning than was usual among the Romans, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire; and gave out such comfortable words, that the King entertained and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could have made for him; yet the Embassadors, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and advised him to give the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a Truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in a readiness, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could be in Greece. But by the interposition of this Truce, he no way increased his Forces; he suffered a most convenient season of winning upon the Enemy, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vain hope. Yet was he pleased herewith: as it had been with some Victory: publishing a Copy of the Disputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to understand how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadors also to the Rhodiens, of whose good will to him he was best persuaded; or only to let them know how much he was superior in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans; if perhaps notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied Peace. These were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing upon point of Honour, was no better than mere vanity; his own safety being the utmost of his ambition. This his carelessness might seem excusable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the Greeks; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of necessity: yet was partly their own: had it not been his Office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give such a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were careful not to put their Shoulders to a falling Wall. The Rhodiens, among whom he had many stout Partizans, desired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might seem to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians also, who had entered of late into a strict society with the Macedonians, renounced it now, and made the like with the

Romans:

Romans: to whom further, in a fort, they yielded themselves as Vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission under a general covenant apart, each for it self: to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Commonwealths, they might not (were they never so desirous to rebel) have such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated into one, under the City of Thebes. This work, of separating the Bœotians from Thebes their Head, was more than Aegleus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Macedonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Epaminondas, and a few brave Citizens, than was the society with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Macedonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King sat still, as being bound by the Truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where, vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproved it as dishonest) employed again by the Senate; with commission to deal as he should think expedient. Touching the Embassadors which Perseus had sent; audience was given to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded; but neither excuse nor intreaty would serve their turn: the Senate being resolved before-hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the usual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to such Commanders as might not, by reason of some Custom, enter the City) and had only the short warning of Eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courtesy serve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good counsel: but it was a likely mean both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his business, and to stagger his resolution, when he should need it most firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Lucius the Roman Consul was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have roused Perseus, and have made him lay aside all cowardly hopes of getting Pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while, whether it were not better to offer himself Tributary to the Romans; and to redeem their good will with some part of his Kingdom, that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the stoutest counsel prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would have proved, had it been stoutly and wisely followed. Hence began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what his Forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a Town in Macedonia. All being in readiness, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beasts, to know not what Mintevus, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country, and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his Guard, set forward to Citium. His Army he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, whereto about twelve thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his own Macedonians. These he animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their Ancestors, the infolency of the Romans, the goodness of his Cause, the greatness of his Provisions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedonia there came likewise Messengers, offering to help him with Money and Victuals, according to their several Abilities. He gave them thanks: but answered, That his own provisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he issued forth into Theffaly: knowing that the Romans were to pass thence that Country, in their Journey towards unto him. Some Towns of Theffaly opened their Gates unto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well-manned; and some he won by force. Of these last was Nyle, a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the Assaultants. It was taken by reason of a Sally; which the Towns-men rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entered pell-mell with them at the Gate. All cruelty of War was practised here: to the greater terror of the obstinate. So Velatie and Comus (Towns of much importance, especially Comus, which stood in the straits of Offa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sicrimum, a Town seated on the foot of Mount Offa; where he retired a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Lucius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of Auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes & Attalus his Brother came to him in Theffaly, with four thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the several Estates could afford: or thought expedient to send, which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad, Melampus sent thither his Son Misagenes, with a thousand Foot, as many Horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariseus the Cappadocian, by reason of his Affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this War; perhaps because Eumenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Perseus was contented to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemy (though Ptolemy was then young, and under Tutors) had business of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian; yet each of them promised help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Genius the Ilyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick wherewith M. Lucius, the Roman Admirals Brother, served him, for this his counsellor good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrachium, uncertain to what purpose: all which Lucius took away, after a very kind sort; making them to believe, That for none other end than to serve the

Romans,

Romans, their good friend Genius had sent thither this Fleet. But whatsoever Genius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his Kingdom and himself, in the end of this War; by offering, rather than giving his help to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought over the Sea, Licinius came into Thessaly, foisted with a painful Journey, through the Mountainous Country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plains, the Romans must needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himself and his wearied Army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his Auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender help, that could enable him to deal with Perseus. Therefore he resolved to abide where he then was, and keep his Trenches, until his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himself in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The Land of Thessaly, in which these two Armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitful, and abounding in all things needful to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautiful Valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often used at large to signify the most pleasant and goodly places. This Valley of it felt was not great; but adding to it those huge Mountains Off and Olympus (famous in Poëtic) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unless they would make an hungry Journey thorow the Country of the Dassaretians, as in the former War with Philip; they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being Master of the Straights leading unto Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the rugged passages of these Mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the works; yea, to win upon them (for a while) every more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionless he might have done far greater things, had he seized upon the Straights of Aons, which his Father once kept, and defended all the Country behind the Mountains of Pindus. Surely, not without extreme difficulty, with all the Romans have either travelled by Land, with all their Carriages and Impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found, or else have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needful, unto the mercy of the Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courses they once deviated, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present War. It may perhaps be said, that the Greeks, and others, whom the King must have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his Father in the former War. The Aetolians, upon whom the Athamians depended, grew into faction with the Romans (as we shall find anon) even as soon as they met with Perseus. The Epi-

tians, how politically soever Martius had wrought with them, adventured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrel: what would they have done, if he at first had done his best? The Rhodiens, Lyrians, yea, and Eumenes himself, after a while began to waver, when they saw things go better with Perseus, than they had expected. So that if instead of discouraging his Friends, by suing basely for Peace; he had raised their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his well-willings; yea, and bought down with money (as he might have done) some of his Enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have been compelled to forsake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the Liberty by them given, entire; which otherwise was but imaginary. Such benefit of this War, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason have been expected at first, from greater advantages. But as a fearful company running from their Enemies, till some River lay their flight; are there compelled by meer desperation to do such acts, as done, while the battle lasted, would have won the Victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to avoid that danger of that War, wherein if he should have fought the honour; he left his Friends that would have stood by him, and gave them cause to provide for their own safety: yet being overtaken by necessity, he chose rather to fly back to the Mountains of Tempe, and defend himself with his proper Forces; than to be driven into such misery, as was inevitable, if he have a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessaly, it is hard to show particularly, for that the History of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the sum.

The Consul having no desire to fight, until such time as all his Forces were arrived; kept within his Trenches, and lay still encamped by the River of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which persuaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter unto a hasty trial. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the Field; by waiving the Land of the Phereans their Confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their Trenches: out of which, if they issued, it was likely that his advantage in Horle would make the Victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was fudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his Horle, and with them some light-armed Foot, to entertain Skirmish. The Captain, and some other of the were slain: but no matter of importance done for that neither Licinius nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazard battle. Thus, day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battle; which they still refused. Herdoy his boldness much increased; and much more his reputation: to the grief of those, who being so far come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame that fell upon them by their enduring their Bravadoes. The Town of Sycarum, where Perseus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which used to take up four hours of the morning, but he was fain to bring water along with him in Carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirstily when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconveniences, he found out a Lodging seven miles nearer to the Enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sun-rising. His coming at such an unusual hour, filled the Camp with Tumult: innumerable as though he brought with him only his Horle and light Armature, that were unfit to assail the Trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his Brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of Horle, his Velites, and all the rest of his light Armature to try their fortune: he himself remaining in the Camp, with his Legions in readiness. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the Victory in a manner intire (though the Thessalians made a good retreat) with little loss of his own. But he discovered his weakness ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to counsel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great rage, lest he should assault their Camp; and to that purpose, upon the first news of his success, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unfurled for: he nevertheless took it for found advice, which indeed was timorous and base. To work warily, and moderate his Victory; by which means it was said, That either he should get honest conditions of Peace, or at least many Companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like that his good fortune would exalt the Hope and Courage of his Friends. Yet, had it been greater, and had he won the Roman Camp, his Friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for Peace: And in suing for it, even when he had the Victory; what else did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, That neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yielding to the Romans, whenever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the joy of his Victory would admit none of the Considerations. He had slain of the Roman Horle two hundred, and taken of them Prisoners the like number. Of their Foot he had slain about two thousand: losing of his own no more than twenty Horle, and forty Foot. The Roman Camp, after this disaster, was full of heaviness and fear: it being much doubted that the Enemy would set upon it. Eumenes gave counsel to dislodge by night, and remove to a surer place beyond the River Peneus. The Consul, though alarmed to profits, by so doing, in what fear he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the Loss paid, than by standing on proud terms, to draw upon himself a greater Calamity. So he passed the River in the dead of the Night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Aetolians were sorely blamed for this loss: as if rather a traitorous meaning, than any true fear, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of especial mark, had been observed to be the first which turned their backs: an observation likely to cost them dear, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their virtue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learn by Examples of either kind, that if they would shun indignation, or incur favour, then must they adventure no less for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own Liberty. Thus ended it with the Consul and his Army. Perseus came the next day to correct the former days error; which how great it was, they not until then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whether they could never have attained, if the King had either pressed his Victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light Armature being alone sufficient to have routed them whilst they were conveying to themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City. The Gentlemen of Rome, out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Consuls, and all that bore Office or Command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they flew away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoils of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such brave words did the King set out the Glory of his Action; dividing the spoils among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour found. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mafissa, a place in a mid-way between Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to press them somewhat harder. Nevertheless he was easily persuaded to use the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining Peace. Therefore he sent unto the Consul, and offered to yield unto the same Conditions wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans; if the War might to take end. It were needless here again to show the folly of this course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired Peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a Truce, whilst Eumenes should go to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions, and ratify the League. And of such a Truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no small discommodity returned. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of Peace there was none; save that Perseus would yield both his Kingdom and Person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be so resolute in Adversity. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that having received an answer to pre-emptory he still persisted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the Peace which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himself back to Sycarum. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose Forces were well repaired by the coming of Maffigenes the Son of Maffinilla, with the aid before mentioned. This distance between the King and him, caused the Romans to wax the more bold in making their Harveist: about which business they ranged over all the Fields. Their careless demeanour gave him hope to do some notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon those that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the first season; but the alarm being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprise. As for the Foragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilst he strove to force a Guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a Skirmish of Horle, or (for the report is divers) in a great Battle, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few days, to fall back into Macedon.

cedors as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was: whereby what loss he felt will appear hereafter. He left all behind him, gave only Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easy prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight into Comus; hoping to have taken it, and to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back unto the Perreians and others; from whom he won some Towns, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry Towns thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul took, may seem not to have belonged unto the Thessalians; unless, perhaps, after his Victory, Perseus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got some part of Thessaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a precise account; for that the Histories of them are greatly deficient. One may think it strange, that the Boeotians, whom a Roman Ambassador could terrify, and bring altogether to his own will, should not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navy on their Coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martinus, were more true to Rome, than other petty Towns, which by that same diffraction of the Fæderis, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had been. The causes hereof were to have been fought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Licinius the Roman Admiral: who got so much by spoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebel in like sort, if by extrem oppression he could have driven them so far. Neither was Licinius the Consul undiligent in the same kind. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I find nowhere mentioned. Only this is said in general; That in the War which he made, he cruelly and covetously demeaned himself.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hyllinus the Consul, and Hortensius the Admiral, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hyllinus shewed more of his industry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the War against the Macedonians. For concerning the Roman War upon his Kingdom, after that the Consul had fought passage in vain over certain Mountains, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that side which looked towards Thyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Army of four Thousand, and who, by Leives made upon the Confederates, doubted this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Usciana, a border Town of Thyria, by Treachery, came thither in such careless order, that the Inhabitants which had made them of Treason, with purpose only to train him into danger; fellied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chased him so far, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Town of Usciana, shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soon recovered it, and many other places therewithal: Corycæ a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon, and Cephalus an Epirat, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painful Journey into Ætolia, where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest City in that Region. Of this hope though he was disappointed by those of the Roman Faction, yet in his return home, he took in Aprantia; and shortly after heard good news, that Ap. Claudius was again thoroughly beaten by Cleus, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian War under Hyllinus. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affliction towards Rome. For these Embassadors travelling thorough all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gave out speeches tending to shew, that they liked no better of those who fought not by might and main to advance their business, than of those which were of the Macedonian Faction. Their meaning was, to have accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Com. Polyb. 174. mander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopemen; and together with him, his son Polybius, who soon after was General of the Achaean Horse; but more notable by that excellent History which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The form of the accusation should have been; That they were not hearty Friends unto the Romans, but such as abstained from railing troubles, more for lack of opportunity, than for any love to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: they demanded hostages, and found none in the Council that approved the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that intreated to have Roman Garrisons bestowed in their Towns. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions took effect. They of the Roman Faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriots; making it no less than a matter of Treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thanks of their base flattery, rating them openly, in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in the presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations, and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could believe none ill; though it were well enough known what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burden for the present War, unless it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meet. Of this Decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that standing on privileges herof, refused to fulfill every commandment, were numbered among the Patriots; which in the end of this War proved little better, if not worse, than to have been Traitors. The Senate was driven to set down this order, by reason of many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Licinius and Hortensius. Licinius was condemned in a great sum of Money, for the wrongs by him done; highly to the commendation of the Roman, in that they loved not to have their Subjects

oppressed. Hortensius being still in Office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redress of injuries, or to offer their services: it is not unworthy, that from Alabanda, a Town of the lesser Asia, there was presented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flattery. These Alabanders brought three hundred Horsemens Targets, and a Crown of Gold, to bestow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a desire to gratify the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be singular, and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple unto the Town Rome, and appointed anniversary Games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddess. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Perseus, and the like vain men, that would be thought gods; or at the shameful flattery of such as bestowed upon men, and not the most virtuous of men, divine honours: when he sees a Town of Houles, wherein powerful men dwell, worshipped as a Goddess; and receiving (without korn of the Givers, or shame of the Present) the title of Deity, at such a rascal City as Alabanda?

SECT. VII.

Q. Martinus the Roman Consul, with extrem difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardice of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The Town of Diium quitted by Martinus; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Their affairs in hard estate. Martinus a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Ambassador to Martinus from the Achæans. Polybius his honest wisdom beneficial to the Achæans. King Eumenes grows averse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria; whom he draws into the Roman War. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians; who vainly take upon them to be Arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perseus loses a mighty succour of the Bastarnæ, by his wretched parsimony.

AFTER two years of the Macedonian war, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the War began; which had been thought likely to reform all those Countreys, and bring them to what pass the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he lived in Peace. He had enlarged his Borders on the Illyrian side, his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the War might prove, and therefore upon to become wile for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius, and Hyllinus the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vain, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprise of Conquest, by many losses received.

The Roman Admirals had so demeaned themselves, that many Towns, even of the best situated to Rome, kept them out by force. General, by the fear was great on the Roman side; and the Army much lessened, not only by casualties of War, but by the faculty of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himself (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licencing the Soldiers to depart. Quintus Martinus the new Consul, who succeeded unto Hyllinus, was to amend all this: which nevertheless was more than he knew how to do; though he began with him a strong supply of men. He brought horly to him the War on the Foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way; not seeking to force the Straights that were surely Guarded, but taking pains to climb the Mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage over them, without help or need of any custody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, distributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit access; and the Consul proceeded in his Journey: with hope, either not to be discovered by the Enemy, or to break through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as convenient ground, as they should have that lay to (stop him; and at length, if all failed; to make a safe retreat. He went before him four thousand of his most expedite Foot, to discover the ways. Two days was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had fight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe piece of ground; and sent back word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten unto them: which he did. The Macedonian where not a wile dismayed at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three days together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loss on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a Mountain, which gave scarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed; all the rest were beholders. In this case it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to return. Wherefore Martinus took the only course remaining: and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians: whilst he, with the rest, fetcht a compass about, and fought ways that never had been trodden. Herein he found extrem difficulty: which notwithstanding, he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such Journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled by labour of hand; to make paths where none were; yea, where Nature might seem to have intended, that none should be. So steep he found the descent of the Mountains, in this way which he took: that of seven miles, which they travelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part to rowl themselves down, as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with Rocks, that stood one over another, so upright; and cumbersome to get down: that their Elephants were afraid of that giddy project, and casting their Governors, made a terrible noise; which affrighted the Horses, and bred great confusion: Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous Journey; there was nothing more devised by the Soldiers, than that they might be suffered to creep back again, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kind of Bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the end of the Cliff, the other sustained by two long Poles, fastened in the ground below. Upon these two Poles, or Poles, (which indeed, not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastened two raters, answerable in length to the distance between the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one Bridge might reach to the beginning of another. They were covered with Planks and Turfe; that they might seem continent with the ground: so to make the Beasts adventurous to go upon them. If there were a plain of any good extent from the foot of a Rock, to the next down-fall; then might the Bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of these; the Poles upholding the frame were cut asunder: thereby causing him to sink down into the next Bridge; whence he was conveyed in like manner to the third, and onward still to the very bottom. Thus went they down sliding, some on their Feet, others on their Buttocks, till they came to an even Valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans use to be in their Journeys, of things needful in all occasions; as also what ineffable pains they took in this descent, about the conveyance of themselves and all their Carriages down the Mountains. The next day they rested, staying for Euphrates and his Company, who hardly, or perhaps, should have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set upon him from aloft. The third and fourth days journeys were like unto the first: gave that custom, and the nearness to their ways end without meeting Enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: since they fought with his men upon the passage, three days together: he lying so nigh, that he might well-near have heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with fear; that he neither fitted to help his own men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsel, fate hearkening after the event. Four only passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Comus; which the Romans were unable to force; the second and third were the same which Marius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it, the last, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoever would seek any other way, must be fain to take such pains as Marius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King did benefit: for that his Enemies could not get thither, save through the Valley it self, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood upon the huge Mountain Olympus, about a mile from the Sea: of which mile, the River Helicon becoming there a Lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one half, the rest being such as might easily have been fortified. Besides all these, there was in the midst of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keep: where the spurs of the Mountains, reaching far into the Valley, drew near to the very Banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep River which ran through it. Wherefore nothing had been more easy, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome Journey: if Perseus could have seen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill case to night, after the vexation of that miserable travel: but must needs have either perished for want of Victuals, or been enforced to return the same way that he came, if the King had made good the strait of Dium. To have returned and climbed up with their Elephants and Carriages, against those Rocks, from which, with extraordinary labour, they could hardly get down, it seems a matter of impossibility: especially considering how the Enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them: being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange that the Romans did not rather take their Journey into Macedon, from the side of Thracia, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they departed to win. But the Cowardize of Perseus did commend the counsel by them followed, as wife. For he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe, than he feared like one out of his Wits; saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all, without battle. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haste; and straightways abandoned the Town. In the same vehemency of amazement, he sent a straight command to Theflalonica, that the Arsenal there should be set on fire; and Pella, that his Treasures there should be cast into the Sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be Masters of these two Cities. Nicasa, who was appointed to draw the Treasure, performed it as hastily as well he could: though soon after, his Master grew sorry for the loss; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the Water. But Andronicus, who had charge for sitting on the Kings Arsenal, deferred the execution, foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he prevented the damage. Whether Nicasa, for his absolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easy pardon; is referred in the King to interpret. The reward of his Service was this: Perseus growing ashamed of his mad Cowardize, that appeared in this hasty direction: caused them both to be slain. Also those poor men, which had fetched his Treasure out of the Sea by their Diving, were paid their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witness of the Kings base folly. Such end must they fear, who are privy to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would have gone surely to work, for the hiding of his faults; then must he so royally have behaved himself, that no man might believe him to be the Author of any unworthy act or counsel. But his virtue was of no capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had stopped the Consul on the top of the Mountain) and Asclepiodotus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he raised them openly, saying, That they had betrayed unto the Enemy the Gates and Bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged, then might they have sped as did Nicasa and Andronicus.

The Consul Marius had great cause to rejoice, for for that the King had so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subtil for want of Victuals. He took Dium without resistance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having Travelled about a days Journey, and gotten one Town that yielded, he was compelled by meagre lack of Food for his men, to return back to wards Theflaly. His Fleet came to him, in this time of necessity, well appointed to have helped him in the War: but having left behind, at Albanesia, the Ships of Burthen, which carried the Provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those ways only might Corn be brought to the Army. To meet the sooner with this Corn, which was most desirously expected, he forsook Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish Journey (if not worse than foolish) he lost more, than a little the longer falling had been worth. It is probable that his Carts, withall, or the most of his store, were lost among the Mountains: for otherwise it had been madness to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or light of the Enemy, he should be fain to quit it. Howsoever it was: men thought him a Coward, or at least a bad man of War; since he thus recoyled and gave off, when it most behooved him to have prosecuted the action.

By understanding the folly, or Cowardize of Marius; the King recollected himself, undid what his own error: fought to hide it by such poor means as have been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repaired, finding the Town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Less diligence, more timely uld, would have been enough, not only to have delivered Marius into his hand, but to have given him such an idle hope of Peace, but to have given him such a noble Victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the War upon fair conditions, and not to begin again in hate. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the Conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his Only the Town of Heraclea, standing on the River of Peneus, five mile from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defiance as it could, and was not given up for fear. After this, Marius had taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chief care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admiral to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Theflalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vain. The Fields about Theflalonica were wasted; and some Companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Town, were still put to the work. As for the Town it self, there was danger in coming near it, either by Land or Sea; by reason of the Engines, which shot from the Walls, and reached unto the Fleet.

Wherefore the Admiral setting Sail from thence, ran along by Amia, and Antigonea, (landing near to each of them; and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Palene in the Territory of Cassandrea. There King Sumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty Ships of War: and five other were sent thither from King Perseus. With this access of strength, the Admiral was bold to try his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new Ditch lately cut by Perseus, before the Town: which, while the Romans were filling up, question was made, What became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the bank? By this occasion, it was learned, that there were Arches in the Town-wall filled up with that earth, and covered with one single row of Brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the Town, by fapping the Walls. To this work he appointed such as he thought meet: giving an alarm to the other side of the Town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But whilst the Romans were shouting for joy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Captains within the Town perceived what was done; and falling forth unexpectedly, gave a fierce charge on the Companies that were between the Ditch and the Walls: of whom they slew about six hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good success on that part of the Town which King Sumenes assailed (a supply in the mean while entering the Town by Sea) caused the Siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereto Euphrates, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with such Forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admiral had had time to it; but to keep the Land about it from spoil; or, at least (as they did) to make the Enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphrates had taken his Journey to Demetrias, by Melissae: whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly over their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, letting their Camp on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: yes, it is to be suspected, that some greater harm befell them, or, at least, that they were in more greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining History of this War. For Marius persuaded the Rhodiens by Asclepius their Embassador, who came to him at Heraclea about other business of less importance, That they should do well to interpose themselves as Mediators, and seek to finish the War. Now, although Polybius Poly. Lib. 80. do most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Marius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodiens in danger (as anon it fell out) than for their opposing the resolution of the Senate; that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet since he made shew of fear, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his fear seem not counterfeited. And so were the Rhodiens moved to think of him, not not only for that the extraordinary courtesies, both of him and the Admiral, towards their Embassadors, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perseus, and of Genius the Illyrian, did set out their business at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good Fleet, which the Macedonians had gotten, than with the honour of some Victory, wherein he had lately slain great numbers of the Roman Horse. Thus much we find intimated; though the time, place, or other circumstances of the Fight, be not specified. And here-to may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the Estate of Marius his Army. For they found the Consul wanting near the Admiral wanting men; and for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and App. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme dangers: so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new Army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seem, that some blow had been taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least that the Romans, with greater loss than is before spoken of, had been driven from some of the Towns which they besieged.

Now, although it were so, that Marius, in view of his actions, behaved himself like a man of War: yet in exercise of Courage, which one hath most aptly termed, A crooked or sinister kind of wisdom, he dealt as a Crafts-maker, with a restless working diligence. This indeed neither proved his sufficiency, nor commended his honesty; since thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit; and nevertheless out of envy, vain-glory, or such delight as weak and bubble-headed men take, in creating explicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his Country. At such time as Perseus, by the success of his doings against Hyspinius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Thessaly. Archus, Lyceus, and other good Patriots among the Acheans, judged it expedient for their Nations to help the Romans, as in a time of adversity, whom in prosperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archus proposed a Decree, which passed: That the Acheans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with the Romans in all dangers. So the Army was levied: and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors unto Marius, to certify him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busy in finding passage thorow Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army, and awaited the Consul's leisure, till they came to Heraclea; where, finding the time convenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the service of his Nation, whereinsoever it should be commanded. Marius took this very kindly; but said, That he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signify thus much: tarrying himself behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Marius, that App. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, five Thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in Field, he might do notable service, by distracting the Forces of Perseus. But the Labrian head of Marius, could not allow of such plain reason. He called unto him Polybius, to whom he declared, That Appius had no need of such aid, and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Acheans be put to such needless charges. Away went Polybius, smiling, and unable to resolve, whether it were for love to the Acheans, that the Consul was so earnest in this business; or rather for envy, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, since himself could do nothing. But when Polybius was to deliver his opinion in the Council touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own self, and those of his party. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was given him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Marius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to help Claudius, alleging that he had no need: In this case therefore, he had recourse unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessity of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, unless, by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were Givers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polybius himself ran into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policy of Marius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in fear lest the fire, which he himself had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own Lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to outweigh all other passions, it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, have not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, That Eumenes did not so much as give any help to Marius; but coming to have joyed with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leave behind him certain Horse of the Gallo-Greeks, being requested to have done it. If this were true, and that his Brother Attalus tarrying behind with the Consul, did the Romans good service: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, born afterward by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received, that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perseus his desire of accord, for meer desire of gain. And it might well be, that covetousness drew him on, in the course, wherein into indignation first led him. Howsoever it befall; Perseus caused Eumenes to be founded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to solicit him by an Embassy. The tenour of his Advertisements, both to Eumenes and Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love between a King and a free City: that the Romans had quarrel alike to all Kings; though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the help of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the help of Attalus; Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed with help of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes menes to confider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him what they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his War with the Egyptians, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compel the Romans to forebear from their War upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way; and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly touch'd; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer, he began to offer a bargain of Peace for money. He thought the Romans to be now less weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he proposed for his own part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this War, then would he remain a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantity of money (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto Peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give Hostages: Perseus liked well to receive the Hostages, but not to lay out the money, especially before-hand, as was required. He would have had Peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to bear any reasonable cost; but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samos: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the Peace was fully concluded and ratified. The like of Samos was Perseus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the business might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in press. Thus the two Kings did no more than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Genius the Illyrian. He had scrippited this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not fight. Heretofore Perseus loved not to bearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last, to deliver him from all his fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his fear urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Genius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made; and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Army might have comfort; by such access of strength to their party. Privately upon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Genius: who desired the *Rhodian*s, to take upon them as Arbitrators between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the War to an end. The *Rhodian*s thinking that Marius the Consul was no less desirous of Peace, than the *Macedonian*s, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make Peace; willing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors, gave an answer as disdainful, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as the vain glory of the *Rhodian*s was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should have been, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Genius his friendship, made Perseus, without laying out one Ounce of Silver. Now Illyrian he would have hattered this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the War: but then must the money be hattered away. Pantaneus the Macedonian Embassador, who remained with Genius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by Land and Sea, whilst the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Heretupon ten Talents were sent to Pantaneus: who delivered it to the young King, as Earnest of that which followed. More followed it indeed; and sealed up with the seal of the Illyrians, but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Genius had laid hands upon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into Prison, which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their load to Pessa; for that now the Illyrian was of necessity to make War with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the same time through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, under one Claudius, a great Foot, ten thousand Horse, and ten thousand King of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captains to come visit him, whom he promised to gratify with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their General asked, was, whether the King had sent money to give their Soldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Claudius) tell thy Master, that the Gauls will not stir on foot further, until they have Gold, as was agreed, and Hostages. Perseus heretupon took counsel: if to utter his own opinion before men to wile that they would not contradict him, were to take counsel. He made an invective against the incivility and avarice of the Bastarnæ; who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thousand Horse of them he said would be as many as he should need to fight, and not so many, that he should need to fear them. It had been well done; if any of his Counsellors would have told him; That there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, since without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out, by the way of Perræbia, into Thessaly; where, wasting the Country, and filling themselves with spoil, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable service, whether they won any Victory or not. This, and a great deal more, might have been alleged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In conclusion, Antiochus, the same messenger that had been with them before, was sent again, to let them know the Kings mind. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmur of those many Thousands that had been drawn so far to no purpose. But Claudius asked him now again, Whether he had brought the money along with him to pay these five Thousand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antiochus could make no better answer, than (sitting ting excules, the Bastarne returned presently towards Danubius, waiting the Neighbour-paras of Thrace; yet suffering this crafty messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could well have expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a careful Treasurer, and one that would preserve his money for the Romans, without diminishing the sum. But of this painful Office he was very soon discharged by L. Æmilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteen days after his setting forth from Italy, brought the Kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

SECT. VIII.

Of L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul. Æ is Journey. Æ foretells Perseus to discom. Æ will not hazard Battle with any disadvantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moon. *Æ*mylius his superstition. The Battle of Pydna. Perseus his flight. Æ forsakes his Kingdom: which hastily yields to *Æ*mylius. Perseus at Samothrace. Æ yields himself to the Roman Admiral, and is sent prisoner to *Æ*mylius.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though they were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity moved them, that either they decried that Province to L. Æmilius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of Lot, between him and his fellow-Consul; or at least were gladder that the Lot had cast it upon him, than so worthy a man was advanced to the dignity of a second Consulship. He refused to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province, until by Embassadors, thither sent to view the Estate of the War, it was perfectly understood, in what condition both the Roman Forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly known to be such, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a strong supply, not only to the Consul, but unto the Navy, and likewise to the Army that lay between Ilyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmilius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custom, spoke with much gravity and authority. He requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this War, either to accompany him unto Macedon, and there assist him with their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hearsay, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his Father L. Æmilius, who died valiantly in the battle of Canne, might well be living in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his business within the City being dispatched, Æmilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his Journey, with an especial hope of men, that he should finish it so soon and happily, was more than could have been hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium: whence, when the wind came fair, he set Sail at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Coreyra before night. Thence he passed to Delphi: where having done sacrifice to Apoll, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five days more. So are there but five of the fifteen days remaining, in which he finished the War.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium: having parted no labour of Men and of Women to fortify the Banks of Enipeus, where it was fordable in dry weather: so as there was little hope or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of fresh Water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Sea shore, and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmilius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the Shore; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no Shore that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Marius from taking up his Lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could perform no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had such means to lie close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no less difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessary to search another way: which by enquiry was soon found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perrabia: hard of ascent, but fleetly guarded; and therefore promising a fair Journey. Marius either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Soldiers to make the adventure; they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of work as had been their march over Ofsa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and ability to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the Soldiers among other good Lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their General. And now he appointed about five Thousand men to this enterprise; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmilianus and G. Fabius Maximus, his own Sons by nature; but adopted, the one of them, by a Son of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretians; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings Guard, upon the Mountain, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers; who though, at some distance they might do notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darkness took away their aim, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deal with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the business about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet, where Victuals were provided for their Journey: it being supposed, that they were to run along the Coasts of Macedon by Sea, and waste the Country. All the way they were passing the Mountains (which was about three days) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Therefore Æmilius employed none save his Lighters; of whom the Kings light Armature had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vain. Yet Æmilius persisted as he had begun; and recontinued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might have served to teach the Macedonians, that some greater work was in hand: since otherwise a good Captain, as Æmilius was known to be, would not have troubled himself with making such bravado's, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looks only unto that which was before his eyes: until his men, that came quarrelling fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the Camp, that the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult, and the King himself no less (if not more) amazed than any of the rest. Order was forthwith given to dislodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haste, the Camp was broken up, and a speedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had the custody of the passage were taken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good success in their Journey. It may well be, that they kept until the Romans came somewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their Arrows and Slings could do little service, were beaten at handy-strokes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polysius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Marius in the year foregoing; but was closed up again through his not prosecuting so rich opportunity.

Perseus was in an extreme doubt what course to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Towns, and so to linger out the War: having been taught by the last years example, how resolute the People were in making defence. But far worse counsel prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberation. The King resolved to put all at once to hazard of battle: fearing belike to put himself into any one Town, lest that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures always are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even that fame that Æmilius, or any invader, should have desired. So a place was chosen near unto Pydna, that served well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light Armature. There he abode the coming of the Enemy; who stayed not long behind him. As soon as the Romans had sight of the Kings Army; which with greater fear than discretion, had halted away from them, forsaking the Camp that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to give Battle immediately: doubting lest otherwise the King should change his mind, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to lose occasion by delay. But Æmilius told him, that he spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tired with their Journey; had no Camp wherein to rest themselves; nor any thing there, save only the bare ground whereon they stood. For these, and the like respects, the Consul made a stand: and shewing himself unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of Battle, gave charge to have the Camp measured out and entrenched before the Army; whereunto, at good leisure, he fell back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter should be determined each part thinking their own General to blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he executed himself by the backwardness of the Enemy, who advanced no further; but kept upon ground serving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Galba, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Praetor, foretold unto the Consul, and (with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipse of the Moon, which was to be the same night: willing the Soldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was natural, and might be known long before it was seen. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pans of Brass, and Bells, as we do in following a swarm of Bees, thinking that thereby they did the Moon great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deep skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noise, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigy bokeneking their loss: since their desire to fight was now well lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses do signify, or cause any alteration in civil affairs, and matters that have small dependance on natural complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of observation it is, how superstition captivates the wisdom of the wisest, where the help of true Religion is wanting. Æmilius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing; yet above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this Moon, and congratulating with sacrifice her delivery, as soon as the thine out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion, yet it is like, that he, being a Senator; and one of the Council for War, was partly the next morning in a sacrifice done to Heracles: which was no less foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Heracles could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafed to them tokens of good luck in the entrails of the Beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of Victory to Æmilius: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Heracles was a

Greek,

Greek, and partial, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonians than to the Romans. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new goddess, lately Canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their City, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deity; or (if a God of older date were more authentic) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of Military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrary to the rules of War.

Now concerning the Battle; Æmylius was thoroughly persuaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would not have stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Roman faces: which would be much to their hindrance all the fore-noon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the Clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to pass that, which whereto neither of the Generals had ever earnest desire.

A Horle brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman Soldiers followed into the River, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank: whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this Horle over to their own side. These fell to blows, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countreimen seeing this, halted to revenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slain him over the River, whereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battle, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Arms wherewith they served, did require. The ground was a flat Level, save that on the sides a few Hills were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better Soldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could but faintly assist. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the less marvel, that he durst adventure battle, since he had bestowed himself of such a stratagem, whereby to save his own person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward; whose unfavourable devotion could be no better then Hypocritical. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also Plough, Sow, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battle, he found it no better than lost; and he in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as we find recorded are, that the Roman Elephants could do no manner of good: That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly press onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thence much affo-

nished, that the Phalanx rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-born; many of them slain, and the Squadrons following them discouraged herewith, as they retired away towards an Hill. These were the things that fell out over to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to have rent his Coat-Armour for grief. If of the King with all his power of Horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the Victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the battle, was the same which doubled the Consul expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty, or almost the impossibility of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small Battalions pressed hard upon one part of it, and others recoiled from it, it was necessary (if the Macedonians would follow upon those which were put to the worst) that some Files having open way before them, should advance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming to pass, admonished the Consul what was to be done. The long Pikes of the Macedonians were of little use, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction given by Æmylius, when he saw the front of the Enemies great battle become unequal, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the unequal reluctance which they found. Thus was the use of the Phalanx proved unavailable against many small Squadrons, as it had been formerly in the battle of Cyncephale: yea this form of Embattailing was found unserviceable against the other, by reason, that being not every where alike directed, it would break of it self; though here were little such inconvenience of Ground, as had been at Cyncephale.

Perseus, when he saw his battle begin to rout, turned his Bride presently, and ran again towards Pella. All his Horse escaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witnessing for the poor Foot, they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who flew above twenty Thousand of them; though having little cause to be furious, as having lost in that Battle, only some fourscore, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the Foot, escaping from the execution, overtook the King and his Company in a Wood, where they fell to railing at the Horse-men, calling them Cowards, Traitors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himself: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company dispersed themselves: every one as his own occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to lessen. For he felt the danger of fortune, which was most due to himself: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella, he found his Pages and Household-servants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the Battle, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholly time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldness to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unseasonable admonitions, he dashed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in fear, lest they that refused to come at his call, would shortly dare some greater mischief, he stole out of Pella by night. Of his Friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two others. There followed him likewise about 300 Cretians, more for love of his money than of him. To these he gave of his Plate, as much as was worth about fifty Talents, though shortly he consumed them of some part thereof; making them as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the money. The third day after the Battle he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Town-men to fidelity with Tears; and his own speech being hindered by Tears, he appointed Evander to speak what himself would have uttered. But the Amphipolitans made their chief care to look well to themselves. Upon the first flame of the overthrow, they had emptied their Town of two thousand Thracians that lay there in Garrison: sending them forth under colour of a gainful employment, and shutting the Gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bad Evander to begone. The King hearing this, had no mind to tarry: but Embarking himself and the Treasure which he had there, in certain Vessels that he found in the River Strymon; passed over the Isle of Samosbrace: where he hoped to live safe, by privileges of the Religious Sanctuary therein.

These miserable steps of the King make it the less doubtful, how all the Kingdom fell into the power of Æmylius, within few days after his Victory. Pydna, which was nearest at hand, was the last that yielded. About six Thousand of the Soldiers, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the Battle into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of 50 many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippias, who had kept the passage over Ossa against Mastius, with Panacrus, who had been sent Ambassador to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yielding themselves, and the Town of Bereæ, whither they had retired out of the Battle. With the like success came others from Thessalotica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedonia, within two days: the less of the head receiving the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer; when they knew that the King had forsaken his Country: but opened their Gates upon such terms, that the lack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Æmylius sent abroad into the Country, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: he himself marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents: the same, whereof Perseus had lately decanted the Phalanx. But within a very little while he had leave more.

It was soon understood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samosbrace: his own Letters to the Consul confirming the report. He sent these Letters by persons of such mean condition; that his case was pitied; for that he wanted the service of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire favour: which, though he begged in terms fit becoming a King, yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, "King Perseus to the Consul Publius", the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to be re-established, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came no Letters, as home he as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that some might be sent to confer with him about matters of his present estate. Nevertheless, in this Conference, he was marvellously earnest, that he might be allowed still to retain the name of King. And to this end it was, perhaps, that he had so carefully preferred his Treasure, unto the very last: flattering himself with such vain hopes as these: That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him have his desire to live at ease, and to be called King. Yea, it seems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a desire to live in this Isle of Samosbrace: both for that in one of his Consultations about the War, he was dejected by his Friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedonia, for 5 such a paltry Island; and for Lih. l. 45. that he offered to lay up the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he finds it otherwise. They urge him to give place unto necessity, and, without more ado, to yield to the discretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is so far against his mind, that the Conference breaks off without effect. Presently there arrives at Samosbrace, Cn. Octavius the Roman Admiral with his Fleet: who, as he says, as well by terrible Threats, as by fair Language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; where, in fear of Imprisonment, he had now already imprisoned himself. When all would not serve, a question was moved to the Samosbracians: How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy privilege of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samosbracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and sent word to the King, that Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi; whereof unless he can clear himself in judgement, he must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence born to his Majesty, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himself is charged with the same crime. But what will this avail, when the Minister of the fact being brought into judgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the Author? Perseus therefore wills Evander to have consideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Roman hand; who are like to be prebidders and over-seers of this judgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, than once more other hopes remain, than to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not help him. Of this mood Evander seems to like well: and either kills himself, orhoping to escape thence, by decaying the time as it were to get person wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandments. The death of this man, who had luck to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leave him upon this occasion, will tell perilous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the privilege of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm so much, who shall dare to gainstay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that also liable to dispute, which preserves him from captivity, he surpiseeth to escape,

SECT. IX.

Gentius King of the Illyrians taken by the Romans.

ABOUT the same time, and with like celerity, Anticus the Roman Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen Thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anticus arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drove him into Sorda. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of Fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Thyria; Scardis, which, assisted with the Kings pacience, made it seem impossible to be won, in any, not a very long time. Yet Anticus was confident in his late Victory; and therefore presented his Army before the Walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seems, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten, and thereupon forthwith began amazed to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors, by whom, at first, he desired Truce for three days, that he might deliberate concerning his Estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hands on the Roman Embassadors, to have recourse to such mediation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison, where they were all alive. Having obtained three days respite, he passed up a River, within half a mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scardis, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed, to hearken whether the report were true, that his Brother Caranus was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Sorda. He sent messengers craving access unto the Prætor; beseeching whom, having lamented his folly past (which, excusing the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yielded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his Kingdom, together with his Wife, Children, Brother, Friends, were presently given up. So this War ended in thirty days: the people of Rome not knowing that it was begun, until Perseus, one of the Embassadors that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anticus how all had passed.

SECT. X.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon, after their Victory over Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune, and to look Tyrannically upon those that had been unmannerly toward them before, whilst the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these Victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good escape, and fly, with his Treasures, unto Cypris his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one Ship, who easily was persuaded to waite the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himself, with his Wife and ^{Plutarch. in vit. Amyr. Liv. lib. 45. Liv. lib. 44.} Children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only Philip his elder Son, being his Brother by nature) with much ado got out at a Window by a Rope, and over a Mud-wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilst Perseus was searching all along the Shore: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. Here therefore remain towards his Lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himself in an obscure Corner. His Pages mistaking him, ran up and down making inquiry; till Ollivius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their Master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally. That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion a Thessalian, to whom the King had given the custody of his Children, delivered them up to Ollivius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his Son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendered himself, and made the Roman Victory complat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this War to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdom by Arms, and himself by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have been wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Æmynus; before whom he fell to the ground to beseech, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the Victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the less to be esteemed. Æmynus used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a mind, made War upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better Spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the People at Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectfully entreated, he was committed prisoner to Æ. Ælius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdom of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then known, was now translated unto Rome.

good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their errand again. This they performed with a bad grace, saying, That they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of Peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this War was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Romans did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassy to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonians, whose partizans they were, and should be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning Apparel, as humble Suppliants, they went about the City, beseeching all men, especially the great Ores, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of War from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent Prisoners to Rome; excepting some that flew themselves for fear, whose goods also were Confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and less would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a mild sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in deceiving War against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to snatch, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equal Friends.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Emilius himself made progress thorow the Country; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias, were slain at one time by those of the Roman Faction, and with help of the Roman Soldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their Goods Confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redress was such, as required not the pains of supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Country, he seized like a King, with excessive cheer; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easy matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors were likewise sent from Rome, to give orders for settling the Estate of Macedon; towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such case; and some, to visit the affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Emilius, and the Embassadors, his Assistants, who had order therefrom the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow: The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by half. As for the rest, the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden Commerce on with the other. All the Nobility were sent Captive into Italy, with their Wives and Children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Laws of the Country were abrogated: and new given by Emilius. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to do, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leave any inconvenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not Subjects to Rome, the things done to them could deserve no better name than usuet Tyranny: yea, and shameful perjury; were it not so, that the familiar custom, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oaths of confederation seem of no validity. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greeks, called before them all such men of note, from every quarter, as had any way discovered an unrevocable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome, where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent Letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Roman hands: and in that respect, though they were not Subjects, yet wanted there not colour, for using them as Traitors, or at least as Enemies. But since only two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian side: and since it is confessed, that the good Patriots were no less afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyranny. With the Acheans these Embassadors were to deal more formally; not so much because that Common-wealth was strong; (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Communion to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of sign, by Letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Acheans could be suspiciously charged to have held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his Adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or suffering their service to the Romans; but only such as were the best Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to use the benefit of the time; wherein, since all men trembled for fear of Rome, the season seemed highly to rank the Acheans with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if some sharp order were not now taken, he and his fellows should be made to pay for their mischievous devices ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Acheans: where one of them, in open Assembly of the Nation, spake, as Callicrates had before instructed him. He said, That some of the chief among them, had with money and other means befriended Perseus. This being so, he desired that all such men might be condemned; whom, after sentence given, he would name unto them. After sentence given (cried out the whole Assembly) what Justice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well do; we will soon condemn them: Then did the Roman boldly, That all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, than should

I likewise have been friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man accuse me, I shall throughout answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon these words of Xenon, the Embassador laid hold and said, That even so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a Thousand; willing them to appear and answer before the Senate. This might even be termed the Captivity of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause, than their love unto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that virtue, and regard of the public liberty, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all cast into Prison, as men already condemned by the Athenians. Many Embassadors were sent from Achaia, (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of their innocent men could be remaining: since honesty had been thus punished as a Vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to inform the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Athenians, nor yet held to be offenders. But instead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that these men should return into Achaia. Neither could any consolation of the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all, until after seventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and virtuous man Philopator the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or, having made offer to escape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as Malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirotes. For the Senate being desirous to preserve the Macedonian Treasures whole; yet withall, to gratify the Souldiers, gave order, that the whole Country of Epirus should be put to sack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Antiochus with mischievous subtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, bidding them well to use the liberty bestowed upon them by the people of Rome; he sent unto the Epirotes for ten of the principal men out of every City. These he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and sent along with them, into every one of their Towns, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gave secret instructions to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed, they should fall to sack every one of the Town whereinto he was sent. Thus in one day were threethree and ten Cities, all consecrated with the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of Hostility in a time of Peace, a hundred and fifty Thousand of that Nation made Slaves. It may be granted, that some of the Epirotes deserved punishment, as having favoured Perseus. But since they among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yet, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already sent into Italy, there to receive their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not only at the present in good obedience, but had even in this War done good service against the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all, it is the less marvellous that God was pleased to make Antiochus Childless, even in the Glory of his Triumph, how great soever otherwise his virtues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their Victory with the Greeks and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof, before we speak, we must say somewhat of Antiochus his fore-gors, of himself, and of his affairs about which these Embassadors came.

SECT. XL

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embassadors.

Antiochus the Great, after his Peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his Reign and Life. He died the six and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Antiochus Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Beth, or according to Strabo, Jupiter. He left behind three Sons, Strabo, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one Daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Antiochus Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his Sons; reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Eusebius, Apian, and Sulpicius; though Josephus give him but five years. A Prince, who, as he was forthly by nature, to the great loss which his Father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing of any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his birth, Daniel gave this Judgement, Et habit in dies ejus vultus ejus & Antiochus, the Father of this man of a King, under this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and others to the same effect: *What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, because of the goodness of Onias the Priest, it came to pass, that even the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon, of Benjamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasure of the Temple; and of Heliodorus felt by the King to seize them; and of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias, of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the Books of Maccabees take beginning. Which Books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first Book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his Story; nor of the acts of his Successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Brother and Successor of this Seleucus, from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabees (who died in the hundred threethree and seventeen year of the Greek in Syria) that first Book treateth. The Author of the second Book, although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Prologue, yet he endeth* endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian Reign, and with the death of Nicator, slain by Judas: remembering in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jeson the Brother of Onias; who, after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Josephus, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadors to the Jews, as to their Brothers and Kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the Brother and Successor of Judas, remembering the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the people of Sparta by Nicomachus and Antipater his Embassadors, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Josephus adds, that the name of the Lacedaemonian Embassador was Demetrius, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her Claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seventh and thirtieth year of the Greek in Syria. He was the second Son of the Great Antiochus; and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his Brother; which also he usurped from his Brothers Son.

Antiochus Philometor, his Nephew by his Sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven years King of Egypt.

Antiochus Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt four and twenty year, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the Great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdom between them, whilst he was a Child. But they found such other business ere long with the Romans as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave with his Daughter in marriage, unto this Philometor, the Provinces of Calycis, Phoenice, and Judea, which he had won by his Victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian Forces in those parts. Nevertheless, Philometor adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater security. He left behind his two Sons, this Antiochus Philometor, and Antiochus Physcon, with a Daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her Brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her Daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Antiochus Philometor, so called (that is the Lover of his Mother) by a bitter nickname, because he flew her, fell into hatred with his Subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdom, his younger Brother being set up against him. Physcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himself in Memphis, craving succour of Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, sought by all means possible to possess himself of that Kingdom. He sent Apollonius the Son of Mordaneus Embassador into Egypt, and under colour to assist the Kings Coronation, he gave him instructions to persuade the Government of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew, with the principal places of that Kingdom, into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all arguments to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he along the Coast of Syria to Joppa, and from thence on the fudden he turned himself towards Jerusalem; where, by Mat. 4. Jeson the Priest, (a Chaplain fit for such a Patron) he was with all pomp and solemnity received into the City. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the Brother and Predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the Treasures thereof to Apollonius, Governor of Calycis and Phoenicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from Heaven; the said Apollonius being stricken by the Angel of God, and recovering again at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrify others from the like ungodly practices. Presently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jeson, the Brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his Brother, and to obtain the Priesthood for himself, offered unto the King three hundred and threethree Talents of silver, with other rents and sums of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jeson, and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Athenians, when as that mischievous Cadistars, who had been too hard for all worthy and virtuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his own condition. It was thus:

One Fire than other burns more forcibly,
One Wolf than other Wolves does bite more sore,
One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly:
So one most mischievous of men before,
Callistrates, false knave as hawk might be,
Met with Menalcas more false than he.

And even thus it fell out with Jeson: who within three years after was betrayed, and over-bidden by Heliodorus the Brother of Simon, that for three hundred Talents more obtained the Priesthood for himself: Jeson thereupon being forced to fly from Jerusalem, and to hide himself among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem, Antiochus marched into Phoenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of War, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty Army of Mac. 14. Land-forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Kingdoms, and entered Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navy, and moved War against Ptolemicus King of Egypt; but Ptolemicus was afraid of him, and fled, v. 13, 19, and many were wounded to death. He won many strong Cities, and took away the spoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecy of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentiful Province, and he shall do that which his Fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Father. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a Victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow to the Captains of Ptolemy, between Pelusium, and the Hill Cassius, after which he entered and sacked the great and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had finished Egypt, he turned again, and went up towards Hebron and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entered proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the Golden Altar, Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Show-bread, and the pouring Vessel, and the Bolt, and the Golden Basons, and the Vail, and the Crown, and the Golden Apparel. He took also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men.

Lib. 6.

* Chap. 5.

* lib. 2.

Polyb. Lib.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian War, that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian business. At what time he had laid claim to Cæle Syria, justifying his title by * the same allegations which his Father had made; and stiffly averring, that this Province had not been conquered over to the Egyptian, or given in dowry with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a fair way to get all Egypt. The Acheans, Rhodiens, Attians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by several Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philoterus, the elder Brother of the Ptolomies, then should the War be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two Brothers consume themselves with intestine War, than by the terror of his Arms, threatening destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his Forces for the present; leaving the Ptolomies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruined by his invasion, the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how was fever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other business at Jerusalem, or elsewhere. So after the sack of Jerusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians, and others in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of Syria, called Antiochia. For Governor of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the mean while, Menelaus, the Brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Jafon out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred Talents for an In-come; committing the charge of the Priesthood to his Brother Lysimachus, stole certain Vessels of Gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus, the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth to advance the payment of the three hundred Talents promised; the same being now by Solistratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Jafon) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeal, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himself into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight, adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compals it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweet Springs, banqueting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust, and other such voluptuousness. Whether it were well done of Onias to commit himself to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim privilege from the Holiness of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen Gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine own opinion, that the inconvenience is far less, to hold this flatter which Onias (though a virtuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the Book seems to do. As to this refuge, it could not save the life of the poor old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus parts, prayed him to slay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counselled him craftily, giving him his ring, he band with an Oath, Mac. 2. 4. and persuaded him to come to * of the Sanctuary; so he flew him incontinently, with any regard of righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City; and in the same place where he had committed the wickedness against Onias, he was slain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I should have thought that this wicked King had once in his life time done Justice. But presently after this, at the suite of one Ptolomy, a Traitor to Ptolomy Philometer, he condemned innocent men to death, who justly complained against Menelaus, and his Brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Vessels of Gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his own outrageous will, and by any regard of Justice: since he revenged the same cause with Onias Phon, had they sold their souls as innocents. By reason of such his uncharitableness, this King was commonly termed Eupimenes, that is, Mad, instead of Epiphaneus, which signifies Noble, or Lustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second Voyage into Egypt, and then were there Mac. 2. 4. throughout all the City of Jerusalem, forty days long, Herodotus running in the Air with Robes of Gold, and as Bands of Spear-men, and as Troops of Horse-men set in array, encountering and confusing one against another. Of these prodigious signs, or rather forcible warnings of God, all Histories have delivered us, some more, some less. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Vespasian, a Star in the form of a City, after which there followed a slaughter like unto this of Epiphaneus, though far greater. In the Cymbrian Wars, Vergil tells us, that the Armies were then fighting in the Air from the morning till the evening.

In the time of Pope Joh the seventh, a fountain poured out blood instead of Water, in or near the City of Genoa; soon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of Mercator, these and the like prodigious signs, Viperæ hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me most memorable, because the most infamous and notorious. All men know, that in the Emperor Julius Cæsar, the off-spring of the Cæsars, as well natural as adopted, took end; whereof this notable sign gave warning.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Sext. Calp. Eagle let fall into her Arms a white Hen, holding a Laurel branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished. The white branch to be planted: of the Hen came a fair increase of white Poultry; and from the little branch there sprang up in time a Grove of Laurel, so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors were used to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the Triumphs ended, ended, to let it again in the same ground: which Branches were observed, when they happened to wither, to forewarn the death of those persons who carried them in Triumph. And in the last year of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsar Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were thickened down with lightning. That the Jews did not think such strange signs to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling upon God, and praying, that these tokens might turn to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt, was occasioned by discord of the two Brethren therein reigning: so was this second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomy being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his Brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Uncle, thought it the best way to seek entrance into that royal City, rather by persuasion, than by Arms. Phylo had not yet forgotten the error of the former life: the Alexandrians, though they loved not Ptolomy, yet loved they worse to live in scarcity, or in Vexations (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Country; and the Friends of the younger Brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philoterus in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the fear wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a strong Garrison in Pelusi: retaining that City, which was the Key of Egypt, to his own use. This consideration wrought all with Phylo, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their Sister, the two Brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the news of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged, for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philoterus his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger Brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadors, yet he now prepared to make a sharp War upon them both. And to this end he plentifully furnished and sent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his Land Army into Calcedonia, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhincorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolomy. Their errand was partly to give thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philoterus in his Kingdom, partly to beseech him, that he would rather be pleased to forgive what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter into an Enemy with so puissant an Army. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition; than that Ptolomy should surrender into his hands, together with the City of Pelusi, the whole Territory thereto belonging; and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Isle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For answer unto these demands, he set down a day certain, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entered Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolmy in Arabia, as in Egypt it felt, to Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to resist him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria, passed on thitherwards by safe journeys.

On all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long ago. But they found, or were contented to see, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a Civil War; and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet yet they gave consideration, that it would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdom of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, as would not do, being troubled with Persians; and therefore loath to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyfully in need of help against their Uncle, who prepared and made open War against them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arm in defence of their Kingdom.

Rome had been furnished with word from Egypt, in the War of Hannibal; when Isid, Lyons, Wales, had neither Corn nor Money wherewith to buy sufficient force. By help of the Egyptians had Isid laid the foundation of that greatness, where to the Acheans attained. And by the like help had Rhodes been defended against Domitius Philoterus. Neither were these friendly turns, which that bountiful house of the Ptolomies had done for sundry people abroad, left followed, or seconded, by others as bad in requital: but with continuance of suitable beneficence, from time to time increased. Wherefore the two Brothers King abroad considerably for aid especially to the Rhodiens and Acheans, who seemed most able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Phylo and Cleopatra had lent, a year time: but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Acheans they desired in particular, that Lycortas the brave Warriour might be sent unto them, as General of all the Antiochians, and his Son Talysius General of the Horse. Hereunto the Acheans readily consented: and would immediately have made performance, if Calpurnius had not interposed his malicious Art. He, when seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousness to the Romans, or much rather envying the Noble Captains, who served the Kings directly, without the common voice; which was, That no Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be sent unto the Ptolomies. For it was not now (he said) convenient time to entangle them selves in any such business, as might make them less able to yield unto the Romans what helpsoever should be required in the Macedonian War. And in this sentence, he, with those of his faction, obstinately persisted; carrying others with his words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Marius the late Consul had signified unto him, that the Romans were past all need of help: adding further, that a thousand Foot, and two hundred Horse, might well be spared to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to perform any service to the Romans; so far as the Acheans could without trouble, raise their wish, or forty thousand Souldiers. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Cæli raton. For when it was thought that the Decree should have have passed; he brought into the Theatre where the Assembly was held, a Messenger with Letters from Marius: whereby the Achaean were desired to conform themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by sending Embassadors to set Egypt in peace. This was an advice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace: but as in a time of greater business elsewhere, with such mild words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the Achaean should do any good in the same kind. Yet Polibius and his friends durst not gain-say the Roman Counsel; which had the force of an Injunction. So the Kings were left in much distress; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome; and then might the Embassadors, sent from the Roman Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto those Embassadors of Phrygia and Cappadocia; which having stayed more than a whole year in the City, brought nothing of their business to effect until now. The Embassadors delivered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no less than his Brother and Sister.

In this Embassy of Phrygia, now requesting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had been before three or four years last past. For in the beginning of his troubles, which began with the Macedonian Wars either he, or Eumenes, or Leontus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affairs in such good estate, that not only he determined to set upon Antiochus for Calagryta, but would have interposed himself between the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassy was by a Friend persuaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts he fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his Brother and Subjects, to live under protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by attouchment with his Brother and Subjects, he might have seemed to stand in no need of such protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to save both his Kingdom and Life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his Brother and Sister, shewed it self, even in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly clad; the hair of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. They entered into the Senate, and there fell, groveling and prostrate upon the Floor. Their Garments were not so mean and mournful, nor their looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For, having told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had always remained friendly and faithful to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as, if they pleased but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know that the Sen-

nate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that at the Senate protracted any time, or used any delay; then should Phrygia and Cappadocia be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with thankful dishonour to the Senate and People thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lentus, C. Decimus, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the War between those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Phrygia, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that, unless they succumbed, and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and People of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave, and went onward their way within three days after.

Whilst Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Army over Lebanus, some forty miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greetings and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of Paper; willing him to read those Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the business, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandment, after he had stood and paused a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatsoever the Senate shall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Ally of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without ^{Den. 11.} any good issue of his costly Expedition; even in ^{25, 30, 36.} such manner as Daniel had prophesied long before; yea, fulfilling every particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Jersusalem after his return; like as if these things had rather been Historized than foretold by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed a while, and settled the Kingdom of Aegypt, leaving it unto the elder Brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus's Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian Ships.

SECT.

SECT. XII.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings.

Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Mafanilla, and Coys. The end of Perseus and his Children. The instability of Kings Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anticius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this preemptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their Conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had been well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughness of his natural condition, and to give good language to the Achaean and Asians, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far less power than King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much less used any menacing terms, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his Brother Attalus, to gratulate the Victory over Perseus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-Greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who had him be confident, and request of the Senate his Brothers Kingdom for himself; for it should surely be given him. These hopeful promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithful counsel of Stratius a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his Brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had been sent, recounting his own services done to the Romans in the late War; *wherewithall, he forgot not to make of his Brother as good mention as he could: and finally, requested, That the Towns of Zeus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himself. *By his omitting to sue for his Brothers Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that business alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was their custom to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they used singular magnificence. Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Zeus and Maronea: thereby making void all their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Pergamus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another Voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second Voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had laid open unto those ambitious Potentates the way to his own doors. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to fend him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an Enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconsistency; and to entertain him as a friend, was more than their hatred for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by virtue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bythinia had been at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For, entering into the Senate, he lay down and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and favourites; as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of Slaves newly manumitted, professing himself an enfranchised Bondman of the people of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himself safe, though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had been charged. His errand unto the Senate the care of his Son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Towns added to his Kingdom: where, because the grant would have been unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his Son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to him, in freeing it from Antiochus's will, he would thereby to consider, what effectual protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their Patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Masius held his credit with the Roman good. His quarrels were ended with the Carthaginians; which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all Controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Country of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at first they could find no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Nimidian, for having hindered him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leisure to devise upon the ruin of Carthage: after which, the race of Masius himself was shortly by them rooted up. But heretofore the old King never dreamed, He sent to Rome one of his Sons, to congratulate the Victory over Perseus; and offered to come thither himself, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his Son rewarded, and he continued to stay at home.

Cypr the Thracian sent Embassadors to excuse himself touching the aid by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by Hostages; and to intreat, That his Son, which was taken with the Children of Perseus, might be set at liberty for convenient ransom. His excuse was not taken; since he had voluntarily obliged himself to Perseus, by giving Hostages without necessity: Yet was his Son given back to him ransomless; with admonition to carry himself better toward the Romans in time following. His King-

As for those unhappy Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were led thorow Rome, with their Children and Friends, in the Triumphs of Amynius and Anticus. Perseus had often made suit to Amynius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but he still received one scornful answer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himself. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercy than he found, he would rather have sought his death in Macedon, than to have been beholding to the courtesy of his insolent Enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemency, whereof Amynius had given him Love, was no better than this: After that, he, and his fellow-King, had been led in Chains thorow the Streets, before the Chariots of their Triumphant Victors, that were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do sacrifice, he should command the Captives to be led away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanguisher, and misery of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Perseus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either furnished himself, or (for it is diversely reported) was kept watching for force by those that had him in custody; and so dyed for want of sleep. Of his Sons, two dyed; it is uncertain how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his Father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner; or, at his last testament, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such poverty ended the Royal house of Macedon: and it ended on the sudden; though some eight score years after the death of that Monarch, unto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had known it before, that his own Son should one day be compelled to earn his living by handi-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonness of Sovereignty have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his Treasures out of the Sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most under-trodden wretches, are all subject unto the one high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unlikeness to that blessed Counsel, Deus ut vos vultis le dare vultis, a Sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertain that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly,

Ja-ne-fat. ——— Et qui noluit occidere quenquam
10. Passe voluit.

Even they that have no murderous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vain desire of ability to do evil without controul: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few; among whom also, very few there are, that use not this to their own hurt. For who sees not that a Prince, by racking his Sovereign Authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own person) some one of his own Sons or Nephews to root up all his progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearness in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole house, yet reigning over all? The untimely death of many Princes, which could not humble themselves to such flatteries, and the common practice of the Turkish Emperors to murder all their Brethren, without expecting till they offended; are two good proofs hereof. Hereunto may be added, that the Heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traitorously, and barbarously, King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, their apparent to the Crown of the England: which, had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortal enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such examples of the instability whereto all mortal affairs are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitory gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evil that may fall on their own posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That God is the truest and sharpest Schoolmaster that can be. Law of wisdom, for such Kings, as think this world ordained for them, without contrivance to turn it upside down at their pleasure.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Amynius Paulus, it was in all points like that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own person, that was led along therein, as part of his own spoils; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest, and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth, until the Civil Wars which followed upon the death of Julius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have been hindered by the Soldiers; who grudget at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them, but the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the people and Soldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortation. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of this Victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining Sons, that were not given in Adoption: of which, the one dyed five days before the Triumph, the other three days after it. This loss he bore wifely; and told the people, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity; since the joy of his Victory was requited with his own private calamity, instead of the publick.

About the same time, Octavius the Admiral, who had brought Perseus out of Samarbrase; and Anticus the Pretor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their several Triumphs. The glory of which magnificent Spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassadors from all parts, and Kings, either visiting the Imperial City, or offering to visit her, and do their duties in person; were enow to pay unto Rome, Summe Superbium, Take upon the Majesty that they desire have purchased.

BY

BY this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the World; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the height. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the Field; having rooted up, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the World. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the flames of ambition shall beat her great boughs and branches one against another; her Leaves shall fall off, her Limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the Field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, have been the subject of those ancient Histories, which have been preserved, and yet remain among us; and withal so for many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerful Princes and other mighty men have complained against the Variable Time, Destiny, and most of all against the Variable success of worldly things, and Instability of Fortune. To these undertakings, these great Lords of the World have been stirred up, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth up the Air, and bloweth in the Wind; than by the affliction of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation, and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cicero to Pyræas proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so it is to the dead of no use at all; because separate from knowledge. Which, were it otherwise, and the extrem ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have then wished, to have holn out of the world without noise, than to be put in mind, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the World, by rapine, oppression, and cruelty: by giving in spoil the innocent and labouring soul to the idle and insolent; and by having emptied the Cities of the World of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of foreigners.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germans, which had neither greatness nor continuance) there hath been no State fearful in the East, but that of the Turks; nor in the West any Prince that hath spread his wings far over his Nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moor out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the Treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they possess in Europe, they are at this day the most powerful. But as the Turks is now counterpoised by the Persian, so instead of so many Millions as have been spent by the English, French, and Netherland in a defensive War, and in diversions against them, it is easy to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two years, or three at the most, they may not only be persuaded to live in peace, but all their swelling and overflowing Streams may be brought back into their natural channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be regarded; the one seeking to root out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the Truth and sincere Profession thereof; the one to join all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seek a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundless ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already said; That the Kings and Princes of the World have always laid before them the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are always transported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the misery of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope of it; but they follow the counsel of death, upon the first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the World, without speaking a word; which God, with all the works of his Law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is always forgotten. These considered, (saith Solomon) all the works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit: but who believes it till Death tells it us? It was Death, which opening the Conscience of Charles the fifth, made him enjoin his Son Philip to relieve Navarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done upon the Murderers of the Protestants in Mirindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent, That they are but abjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complain, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepassed happiness. He takes account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glass before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein their deformity and rottenness; and they acknowledge it.

Oloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none have dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cut out of the world and despoiled: thou hast drawn together all the far stretched greatness of all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hi-jacet.

Lastly, whereas this Book, by the title it hath, calls it self, The first part of the General History of the World, implying a second and third Volume, which I also intended, and have hewn out; besides many other discouragements, persuading my silence; it hath pleased God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed, whose unspokeable and never enough lamented loss hath taught me to say with Job, Perseus est in bellum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem fletum.

To the READER.

THe use of Chronological Tables is needful to all Historians, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most general: since they cannot, like Annals, yearly set down all occurrences not coherent. This here followeth, may serve as an Index to the present part of this work, pointing unto the several matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far dis-joyned in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be. For howsoever the years of the first Patriarchs may seem to have been well-near complet, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Israel, we find many fractions, and the last years, or years of one King reckoned also as the foremost of another. The same is most likely to have fallen out in many other, though not so precisely recorded. Pereto may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the years, which were in use among sundry Nations, causing the Summer months, in process of some ages, to fall into the winter, and so breeding extream confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to choose out of so many, and so utterly disagreeing computations, as have already gotten Authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alledged, in excuse of such errors, as a more intensitive and perfect Calculator shall happen to find herein. It may serve to free the Book, and likewise the Reader (if but of mean judgement) from any notorious Anachronicism; which ought to suffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only from some errors of the Press, in the numbring of years, but for some hasty mis-reckonings of mine own, which I desire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the Printing of this Table shall not want careful diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall find reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his own ease.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be Conceiv'd. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [Egyptians] there do the numbers underneath proportionably answer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower.
For example, The walls of Jerusalem were finished in the 319 Year from the building of Rome, and in the 314 from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be understood, That Jehosaphat began his reign in the 3774 of the Julian Aera, in the 3092 of the World, and in the 99 year of the Temple. This needs not more illustration, nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with works of this kind.

To avoid prolixity, I have forbore to insert those years, which I find not sign'd with some regardable accident, as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings reign; some change of Government; some battle fought, or the like. So of the 13 years wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the first; that is, omitting all between the 4 of Jehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17 wherein Sylvius Aventinus succeeded, and wherein Je-horam first reigned with Jehosaphat his Father. For I thought it vain to have fill'd up a Page with 12 lines of idle ciphers, numbring forth, 2, 3, 4, 5. and so still onward, till I had come to the first of Aventinus, and the 17 of Jehosaphat. In setting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fifth, seventh, or so forth, in rank of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name, is the first year of his reign; at the end or foot of the name (as the space gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath, are those years of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the year of any remarkable accident.
Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be understood, that the same year belonged not only to the King then beginning, but unto some one or more of his foregoers: as the first year of Jehoram King of Israel, was the same with the second of his Brother Ahaziah, and the 22 of his Father Ahab. So where two or three names are found in one space, as in the 3077 year of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri; it is meant, that every one of them reigned in some part of the same year, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, under the reigns of the Egyptian Kings, are set down the years of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise other-whiles, the day, the month, upon which Nabonassar's year began, which how it varied from other years, may be found in the place last above cited.

Concerning the Aera, or account of years, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome

* See lik.
jet. 6.

Rome built, from Nannafar, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath been said, where due place was, in the book it self: so as it remaineth only to note, that under the title of Olympiads, is set down, first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year of that Olympiad; as that Cyrus began his reign in Persia, in the 55 Olympiad, and the first year thereof.

Now, for that of the year of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to express their several beginnings, some painful Chronologers have divided them proportionally in their several Columns, opposing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. Put this labour have I spared, as more troublesome than useful, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will be only needful to observe, that howsoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24 years older than that of Rome, and 29 than that of Nabonassar, yet the reign of some King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not suite with this difference. Put hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example will explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17th of November, in the year of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw down Images, and reformed many things in Religion, all in her personally learned Jo:eph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980 years, which result from the multiplication of 19, 28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Æon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the years of an Indiction. F being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present year, or if no fraction remain, it shews the last year of that Cycle to be current. I for example, in the 4498 of this Æra, when was fought the great battle of Cannæ, the 1st Prime or golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun 18, and consequently the 7th Omnia Ieter F, as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Æra 4498, by 19 for the Prime, by 28 for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Æra, after the present account, always exceeds the year of the World by 682. Besides the former uses, and other things redounding, it is a better character of a year, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position. None I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in work of this kind: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.

first year, yet not all in that year 1558. but the greater part in the year following, whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25 of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table, but so, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The Julian Feriod, which I have placed as the greater number, over the years of the I'feriod, was deliv'ed by that honourable and excellently learned Joseph Sculliger: being accommodated to the Julian years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980 years, which result from the multiplication of 19, 28, and 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Aeon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the years of an indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present year, or if no fraction remain, it sheweth the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4448th of this Feriod, when was fought the great battle of Cannæ, the I'rim or golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun, 18, and consequently the Omniscient I eter F, as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Feriod 4448, by 19 for the Ferme, by 28 for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Feriod, after the present account, always exceeds the year of the World by 682. Besides the former use, and other thence redounding, it is a better character of a year, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position. More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in works of this kind: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
